Preface

Things alter for the worse spontaneously, if they be not altered for the better designedly.
Francis Bacon

At the start of the legal year on 7 September 2015, the Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland, the Right Honourable Sir Declan Morgan, announced that he had invited me to lead a fundamental review of the civil and family justice system in this jurisdiction. According to the terms of reference,¹ the aim of the review of civil and family justice is to look fundamentally at current procedures for the administration of civil and family justice, with a view to:

- improving access to justice;
- achieving better outcomes for court users, particularly for children and young people;
- creating a more responsive and proportionate system; and
- making better use of available resources, including through the use of new technologies and greater opportunities for digital working.

The last comprehensive review of the civil justice system in Northern Ireland² was some 17 years ago, since which time there have been dramatic changes both in the environment within which the civil and family courts operate and in the public’s expectations about the services that should be available to them and how they should be delivered. Not surprisingly, therefore, there has been a great deal of ground to cover in this Review, as a consequence of which I have decided to produce two separate reports, with this first Report concerning the family justice system.

It is my intention to publish a further report that will address a range of matters in relation to civil justice. That Report will look in more depth at opportunities for digital working as well as considering the governance and organisation of the courts, the structures needed to provide for the most effective management of court business and the respective jurisdictions of the various court tiers.

In both tasks I have been very ably supported by a Review Group and a Reference Group, further details of which are contained in appendix 1. The Review Group is practitioner-focused and so includes members of the judiciary as well as representatives of the legal professions and the relevant government departments. The Reference Group was established to allow external stakeholder groups to provide their input. Members of the public were encouraged to contribute on the basis of their personal experiences. The Review was, therefore, substantially informed by the views of interested stakeholders.

A series of issues papers, covering key themes across the various court divisions and tiers within the family justice system, was produced by subcommittees of the Review Group that I set up to aid the task, as a means of providing the basis for an informed and inclusive debate. These issues papers, which were based on the ideas put forward for members’ consideration, have been amended, substituted and approved by the Review Group and the Reference Group. Those subcommittees proved invaluable, and I commend every member for the time and skill they invested in this process.

Our role has not been to calculate the costs or savings that our recommendations will engender. In any event, at the time of writing, a budget has not yet been set for the Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service and the Northern Ireland departments for 1 April 2017 onwards. Moreover, quantifying with any accuracy the costs of our proposals, or any anticipated savings from alternative approaches, was beyond our remit. Our role here was to identify a strategic blueprint, and it will be for the relevant department(s) to look at issues such as funding. We have endeavoured to highlight in broad terms where we see scope for efficiencies and invite them to consider a rebalancing of spend.

A further crucial component of this Review was our determination to learn and benefit from the experience of other jurisdictions worldwide with similar legal backgrounds. Hence, we consulted personally and via electronic platforms with judiciary, members of the legal profession and legal and non-legal experts in the family justice systems together with a wide array of distinguished papers as far afield as England, Scotland, the Republic of Ireland, Guernsey, New Zealand, Australia, Canada, the USA, South Africa, the Netherlands and Finland. The unstinting and timeless support that we received from all of these jurisdictions (acknowledged in detail later in this Review) is a testament to the internationalism of family justice and a monument to the concept of international cooperation. As I indicated each time I had the privilege to speak to the representatives of each nation, I fervently hope that one offshoot of this Review will be that the links now forged will remain intact as a harbinger of future relations and contacts between us for the mutual benefit of family justice in our countries.

Finally, we were wary lest we crossed the boundary between review and policymaking. It is not appropriate for me as a member of the judiciary to comment on matters of government policy. As a judge, my role is to uphold the law in force from time to time. Nevertheless, it is an accepted convention that it is appropriate for the judiciary to comment on matters relating to the administration of justice and for the judiciary to point to possible unintended consequences of proposed government policy. That task we have willingly taken up.

The Review Group produced a draft report in August 2016 that was widely circulated and made publicly available. Views were invited until 3 December 2016, and thereafter I consulted an array of persons and bodies who had responded. The response itself was enthusiastic in the main, and we have placed on our website a synthesis of virtually all the input we received. I have taken into account those views, and they have shaped in many instances the contents of this Report.

This Review has placed a premium on public involvement from the outset. In many ways the public input has been the beating heart of this Review. Our aim of being as inclusive as possible explains why we set up a website and mailbox to allow members of the public to share their experiences with us as well as their ideas for how we can create a more modern and responsive system.

I have chaired many committees in my legal and judicial career but none has been more assiduous and creative than the two main committees and the various subcommittees with which I have had the privilege to serve. I make it clear from the outset that any criticisms of our outcomes and recommendations should fall entirely on my shoulders. Not everything contained in this Report received unanimous approval during our meetings, and the only person bearing full responsibility for the final content of this document is me.

The Office of Lord Chief Justice provided the secretariat for the Review. Without the informed, selfless and tireless commitment of Wendy Murray, Karen Caldwell, Julie McGrath and Maura Campbell this Report would never have been assembled much less completed.

The Office of the Official Report (Hansard) in the Northern Ireland Assembly, particularly Phil Girvan, Nicola Murphy, Fintan Murray, Carina Rourke and Alison Webb, provided editorial support.

Key recommendations

This Report contains a large array of individual recommendations arising out of this far-reaching and inclusive exercise. We regard all of them as important and they fit a pattern of proposed reform. Nonetheless, we consider it useful to formulate at the outset the key or flagship recommendations around which the other reforms revolve. They are as follows:

- The creation of a single family court, replacing the existing Family Proceedings Court and Family Care Centre, with the jurisdiction of the High Court preserved only for the most complex or legally sensitive cases.
- The creation of a Family Justice Board, replacing the Children Order Advisory Committee, as a strategic level forum for driving significant improvements in the performance of the family justice system.
- A fresh culture of problem-solving courts within the family justice system, bringing together civil and criminal matters, including a new drug and alcohol court and a domestic violence court.
- A fresh emphasis on solutions outside the court system, with more accessible mediation and educative parenting programmes in private law cases involving children, with a special focus on the future well-being of children and not on the conflict between the adults.
- The introduction of paperless courts including a pilot electronic file management system.
- Greater use of virtual reality courts with video links/Skype/telephonic communication/paper applications and a move towards digital working in the courts.
- Online dispute resolution as an alternative to court in certain types of cases, such as divorce, on a pilot basis.
- In-depth case management of cases involving children, with the introduction of a one-stop shop concept, fast-tracking of cases involving contact disputes and non-accidental injury, and the reduction of delay in achieving permanent outcomes for children. We need to reorganise how we do things to ensure that there is a partnership with the people who are before the courts and the professionals who work in and service them. Critically, we must prioritise prevention and early intervention.
- Developing the voice of the child and extending the use of special measures and support for child and vulnerable witnesses to the family courts, with pilot schemes for the use of registered intermediaries and the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children’s young witness service.
- An information hub with improved support for personal litigants and people with additional needs.
• A new emphasis on open justice within the system.
• Mandatory judicial training, mandatory accreditation of solicitors and barristers and a requirement for practitioners to keep abreast of developments in best practice, both in the UK and internationally.

Introduction

1.1 Throughout history, the law has had to respond to changes in the way people conduct their personal relationships. The present struggle for law to adapt to developments in practices and beliefs concerning family law is no different from any other occasions in the past. Thus, this is a Report not only for the present but for a new generation, with a progressive and unfolding set of recommendations contained therein.

1.2 Law reform or review is always a complicated task, and family law reform is particularly sensitive due to the emotional nature of the subject matter it governs. There are few areas of law that affect so many people, and in such profoundly personal ways. Any review of family justice must reflect changing social patterns, emerging research evidence and the voice of stakeholder groups. Whilst perfection in law reform is undoubtedly a misnomer, respect for the law comes in part from understanding it and what underpins it. We are attempting to achieve that in this Review.

1.3 However, it cannot be assumed that changing social norms and views on reform are uniform or even congruous or reconcilable. The difficulty with recommendations or reform proposals based on appeasing some and providing concessions to others is that it can end up with continuing cycles of dissatisfaction, particularly because the messages conveyed by those recommending the reforms and the messages received by members of the public affected by them are not necessarily the same.¹

1.4 It was not within the remit of this Review to enter into the financial intricacies of the current debate about the overall legal aid budget. However, we would be failing in our responsibility to the public at large if we failed to draw attention to the consequences of the diminution in legal representation that lies in the wake of the changes to the legal aid budget. As we often relate in the Report, the family justice system embraces those who are amongst the most vulnerable and at times dysfunctional individuals in our society and who are caught up in the high octane atmosphere of the family court system. For such people to make their way through the legal labyrinth without the irreplaceable assistance of legal representation is to strike at the heart of a fair and just court system. The effect, both long term and short term, of this vacuum can be profound not only for the individuals but for the families who are the subject of the litigation. Our understanding is that in England and Wales 80% of family law cases have at least one party who is unrepresented. That is not currently the situation in Northern Ireland but those to whom we spoke are clearly fearful that we are heading in this direction. It would be the antithesis of the spirit of this Report if the costs of the reforms herein set out were to be yet another justification for further reductions in legal aid and that the reductions in legal aid would be used to finance these reforms. In truth, it was the experience of all of those to whom we spoke who are involved daily in the family justice system that the reduction in legal representation inexorably leads to the disproportionate lengthening of hearings, with consequent increase in costs, raises the chilling spectre of women being cross-examined by unrepresented malcontents and results in an increase in appeals.

1.5 In the responses, one body — the Family Bar Association — questioned the degree of research upon which many of these reforms are based. This is a matter to which we gave much thought throughout. Three points need to be made. First, where all the promptings of reason and good sense point in one direction, further research is time-wasting and superfluous. Secondly, research can be open-ended, with a plurality of outlets leading to unacceptable agonies of indecision. Particularly where acknowledged experts or a leading person in a field with vast experience has placed his or her imprimatur on a particular step, we have chosen to be guided by this. Thirdly, this is not to underplay the importance of research in certain circumstances. In many instances we have relied on research carried out in Northern Ireland and in other jurisdictions. In a sense this Review is an intervention in a never-ending conversation and an attempt to encourage questing minds. One of our cornerstone suggestions is the setting up of a Family Justice Board. This board will be the perfect vehicle to action further research in those areas where it is deemed necessary and where resources are available.

Single-tier system

1.6 The current transfer arrangements between the Family Proceedings Court (FPC), the Family Care Centre (FCC) and the High Court have been identified as a major cause of delay and inefficiency.

1.7 There is a perception that there really are too many Crown Court centres, which is detrimental to the hearing of civil and family cases in terms of finding any or consecutive hearing days and timely hearings on the days assigned. Moreover, family court judges are isolated and lack a cohesive approach.

1.8 The abolition of the equivalent FPC and FCC in England and Wales and the creation of a single family court, with the jurisdiction of the High Court preserved, has been a very positive development. We recommend legislation to abolish the equivalent FPC and FCC in Northern Ireland and the creation of a single family court, with the jurisdiction of the High Court preserved only for the most complex or legally sensitive cases. Three or four civil and family centres should be created to accommodate this.

Problem-solving courts and private law

1.9 We have to recognise that, in some instances, the dynamics and emotions of family separation make adversarial litigation inappropriate. It is predicated on a win/lose outcome that can drag on interminably. In divorce and child custody cases, the process can increase tensions between the parties, tensions that do not go away after the court process is completed.

1.10 It is incumbent upon us to create a cultural change in Northern Ireland, whereby access to professional support for dysfunctional parental relationships and separating parents becomes the cultural norm — indeed, even an obligatory legal norm perhaps — instead of immediate recourse to the legal process to resolve parental and family relationships. This fresh joined-up approach will begin to educate and empower parents to take responsibility for their circumstance and build their resilience and their family’s resilience so that they can chart a future course that lessens the impact on the emotional and mental health well-being of their families.2

1.11 Our approach throughout this Review was, therefore, outcome-based. There is less of an emphasis on structure and more on solving problems. In essence, we are moving towards problem-solving justice in the Family Division. Our approach led to us grappling with two fundamental issues relevant to the family justice system: to what extent should family law consist of enforceable obligations; and to what extent statements of aspiration? Is the legal system always the best way of resolving the underlying issues that confront the courts?

1.12 We are wedded to the concept of a one-stop shop whereby, at the early directions stage, courts will be empowered to invoke relationship counselling, parent education, debt counselling, addiction/anger management support, pre-mediation support, mediation sessions, contact centres (which we address in some detail) and the creation of specialist courts, such as a family drug and alcohol court or domestic violence court.

1.13 The vexed problem of contact disputes over children requires to be prioritised and fast-tracked towards a fully functioning triage system.

1.14 The court process needs to be streamlined, with online templates guiding swift, succinct, well-informed online applications; an appointment system to make it more efficient; and invocation of modern technology, with Skype, live link, telephone and email all contributing to a new culture. Appropriate judicial training and conferencing will provide a consistent setting for this.

1.15 This leads to the question as to what extent family law should consist of enforceable obligations and to what extent statements of aspiration. Alternatively, it may be that, although the law sets out legal obligations, different means could be used to enforce those obligations.3 Ultimately, however, the right to have these issues determined by a judicial authority must not only remain intact but remain the right of every individual. Parties must not be permitted to wilfully obstruct court orders without facing consequences.

1.16 In all of this there is the real difficulty of enforcement of court orders and directions. The means of enforcement may defeat the purpose for which an order is made in the first place. Hence, we looked at various means of enforcing court orders that may be more effective than the current methods. These innovations include more use of penal notices, community service orders and mandatory attendance at parenting classes in addition to the sledgehammer of imprisonment for contempt for defiance of court orders.

Solutions outside court

1.17 Family justice requires a problem-solving approach that may be best served by resolution outside the court arena. Pre-proceedings counselling, family therapy or mediation could perhaps be more effective in the long term.

1.18 We invested some time researching other models of out-of-court resolution operated in England, New Zealand, Australia and some states in the USA, to which we shall shortly turn.

1.19 Mediation should be more easily accessible and funded by the Legal Services Agency Northern Ireland as part of the court process. Consideration should be given to introducing legislation similar to s. 10 of the Children and Families Act 2014, mandating the undertaking of mediation before issuing any private law children or financial remedy cases.

1.20 However, our preference over a s. 10 approach is for an earlier educative programme similar to that of the Parenting Through Separation (PTS) and family dispute resolution (FDR) in New Zealand (compare similar provisions in England), where families are required to attend save in the exceptional circumstances prior to issuing proceedings. Thus, mediation is seen as but one possible avenue to be explored, which may in the event be advised by PTS.

1.21 Undoubtedly, the family has become more diverse and complex over the last decades, with consequent changes to the nature of disputes brought to court — that is, divorce, maintenance and contact etc. The adults in the family must take responsibility and be supported in achieving the best outcome from a relationship breakdown. However, the courts must be ready to be engaged and take an active role; otherwise there may be a lack of willingness by the parties to agree or mediate a sensible agreement. Support mechanisms, mediation, court proceedings and negotiation must be complementary in aiding the parties to achieve resolution.

1.22 Into this pattern fall our recommendations concerning a family drug and alcohol court, undertaking a Parenting Through Separation type course prior to court hearings, mediation, firm case management hearings in public law cases and fewer court hearings, with the advent of paperless courts and online dispute resolution, all of which are set in a single-tier system in which the voice of the child will be a key component.

1.23 By enhancing parental and family well-being, the service will help to reduce loss of parental working hours, litigation costs, the pressure on health services and household budgets, and the behavioural problems that impact on children and help to improve their attendance rates at school. The one-stop shop concept could be a classic example of the new cooperative, joined-up approach that this Report invites between courts and all the governmental and non-governmental multidisciplinary bodies, acting in tandem in the best interests of children, with huge potential saving in terms of eliminating the current waste of public funds in interminable court hearings.

Divorce

1.24 The complexity of the public/private divide in family law finds no better illustration than in the concept of marriage in the sense that it is an ‘institution’ that politicians seek to promote and support but is also the ultimate ‘private’ arrangement. There is a potential for the contractualisation of marriage whereby couples are encouraged to reach their own agreement, which then forms the basis of law governing their marriage. Such a move can be regarded as part of the shift in the nature of marriage towards being more of a private than a public matter.

1.25 For some time now the courts, through the law, have adopted the concept of no-fault divorce exclusively or as an option compared with traditional fault-grounded divorce. No-fault divorce should have become a quick and inexpensive means of ending a marriage in which the court examines the condition of the marriage rather than the question of whether either party is at fault. It should eliminate the need for one party to accuse the other of a traditional ground for divorce. We examined whether that conceptual change should not evolve into a less costly, more efficient, swifter and technologically friendly approach in an online manner, always bearing in mind the need to keep any children to the fore of a couple’s thinking.

1.26 Accordingly, it is our view that divorces sought on the basis of two-year separation with consent or five-year separation without consent must be dealt with as online paper exercises without the need for a court attendance. The granting of the decree nisi ought still to be made by a judge or Master (‘the adjudicator’) albeit they will determine the matter on the papers before them with the discretion to invoke an oral hearing if it is deemed appropriate in the public interest to do so (for example, where fraud is suspected).

1.27 Fault divorces (for example, on grounds of adultery, desertion, unreasonable behaviour etc.) and nullity should be dealt with as paper exercises online if they are undefended, the grant of a decree again being determined by the adjudicator (that is, a judge or Master on the papers).
1.28 We are not persuaded that we should fully adopt the system in place in New Zealand and Australia where there is, of course, a strictly no-fault approach to divorce and all divorces are dealt with online. We do not consider that that is currently the way forward in Northern Ireland. Whilst, of course, the majority of divorces will be based on two-year or five-year separation or otherwise undefended, and fought divorces in the main seem a waste of costs, a source of emotional stress and to the detriment of productive achievement, there are, nonetheless, some instances where fault divorce, and, for that matter, contested divorces, are acceptable as part of the traditional oral hearing concept before a judge.

Ancillary relief

1.29 Ancillary relief is a key component of relationship breakdown, and that process captured our attention not only in the modern context of a digital era but, more importantly, in an attempt to introduce less rancorous and more measured early neutral evaluation or early resolution than perhaps has hitherto been the case. It is a complex area that may or may not lend itself to easy online remedies, depending on the wishes of the stakeholders involved.

Public law

1.30 Particularly in the public law sphere, the nature of court hearings needs to be reassessed. They should:

- wherever possible, embrace the concept of a one-stop shop where the fundamental issues are gripped and addressed at an early stage with appropriate services there to shorten the cases and address the basic problems;
- deal with cases in a more timely, closely case managed, multidisciplinary, transparent and accountable fashion;
- be heard before properly trained and well-informed judges, emphasising at all stages early crystallisation of the issues;
- be addressed by fully accredited, adequately recompensed and properly instructed lawyers, in appropriate instances, from the outset;
- be serviced by social workers and other experts who understand their role, are well versed and trained in the requirements of a modern family justice system, who attend court only when necessary and where modern means of communication, such as live link, Skype, telephonic communication, email and other modern means of technological communication, are regularly invoked;
- use modern methods of technology where paperless courts, online solutions and virtual reality courts become part of the norm in appropriate instances;
- be set in a single family justice system; and be a forum where all litigants, including personal litigants, obtain a fair hearing with a renewed emphasis on methods of ensuring they have real access to our system of justice.

Secure accommodation orders
1.31 In the interest of the safety and welfare of such children and those escorting them, together with considerations of expense and efficiency, we recommend that in exceptional circumstances the child should not be brought to court but judges should hear the case by live link, albeit the lawyers and other professionals involved shall be present with the child.

Specialist courts
1.32 Into this pattern of self-help, problem-solving courts fall our recommendations concerning the setting up of a family drug and alcohol court and domestic violence court.

International child abduction
1.33 Increasingly, within the rich tapestry of diverse racial cultures that Northern Ireland enjoys, family justice has an international context, and we spent some time considering the ramifications of the Hague convention and other international abduction issues, with the aim of simplifying the process and invoking international mediation as a source of resolution.

Modernising the court: the paperless court
1.34 Our communications technology and online commitment are developing rapidly, changing our lives in respect of both work and leisure. Courts packed with lever arch files — the contents of which are often poorly paginated, incomplete, indecipherable and not looked at — have been the bane of an outdated court system. Hence the concepts of the paperless or paper-light court system, embracing online systems with e-files, e-briefs and e-bundles, are core recommendations. Following on from this, we recommend fewer court hearings in straightforward simple applications and the invocation of modern methods of communication such as Skype, live link or telephone to ensure the time and finances of witnesses are not wasted.

Disclosure
1.35 The extent of disclosure and the need to restrain its reach are also matters that have commanded the attention of courts elsewhere and were an important part of our deliberations.

Voice of the child and vulnerable adults
1.36 Of course, in all our deliberations, not least when considering public law measures, the most important ingredient throughout, and a leitmotif of most of our recommendations, were the interests of the children involved in family relations.
Hence, we devoted time to the importance of the concept of the voice of the child and of the vulnerable, who need to be given fresh emphasis with appropriate help and assistance.

Court setting

1.37 Whilst we remain faithful to the current family court setting and nomenclature of the judiciary, we emphasise the pressing need for plain and simple language to be used throughout court processes, which should be conducted in an inclusive manner.

Open justice

1.38 That complex interplay between private and public law needs to find expression in transparency and accountability in both arenas. Accordingly, in the context of media access to the courts, we recommend changes to ensure more openness and transparency whilst rigorously protecting the identity of children.

Personal litigants

1.39 Improving access to justice was the underlying theme of this entire Review. Hence, not only in the context of the paperless court and online resolution but throughout the entire family system, we were particularly conscious of the need to accommodate personal litigants in an era when the realignment of legal aid will inevitably increase the number of such litigants coming before all courts. This was dealt with conceptually and practically in a comprehensive manner in our Civil Justice Review, but we also venture some recommendations specifically in the family justice context.

Lay magistrates

1.40 We consider that lay magistrates play an important role in Northern Ireland, not only in introducing a fresh mind and experience to judicial thinking in the family justice system but more generally in ensuring that the public continue to play a front-line role in dispensing justice.

Family Justice Board

1.41 The pace of potential change in our family justice system and the new thinking that has emerged are such that we need an overarching supervisory body, independently led by a person of proven distinction, to creatively research, marshal and synthesise a modern, well-informed approach to family justice in the future. The current Children Order Advisory Committee has provided sterling service but perhaps with the passage of time has outlived its intended purpose and needs appropriate replacement. Hence, we recommend the creation of a new overarching Family Justice Board with an independent, paid chair.
Family justice elsewhere

1.42 Our recommendations include fundamental changes to the structure of the family courts. The process of determining our outcome-based concepts borrowed heavily from our direct discussions with colleagues from across the world and research into methods successfully invoked by those jurisdictions. They should remain a permanent part of our family justice tapestry.

1.43 Our approach echoes that being developed in other jurisdictions in the UK and Ireland. There was a review of family justice in England and Wales, led by Sir David Norgrove, in 2010. The current President of the Family Division, Sir James Munby, has been at the forefront of continuing innovative changes there. The Scottish civil justice review in 2010 looked in detail at the family justice system in Scotland. In the Republic of Ireland, the Child Care Law Reporting Project was set up in November 2012 under freshly made regulations arising out of the Child Care (Amendment) Act 2007 providing for the reporting of the proceedings of child care courts.

1.44 In Northern Ireland, much is already happening. The family justice system is governed by a number of departments. The Department of Finance carries the overall civil justice policy lead. The Department of Health has a lead role on the family public law side. The Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service has responsibility for operational administration.

1.45 A number of initiatives have been introduced and are set out in paragraph 2.5.

1.46 Hence, this Review is another important step in the welcome development of multidisciplinary approaches that envisage outcome-focused approaches to ensure all the bodies involved in family justice work corporately and collectively, exploiting new technologies and online access to services along the way.

1.47 Family justice and, for that matter, civil justice have both received less attention than criminal justice for a variety of reasons, including perhaps the fact that responsibilities are dispersed across a number of departments. The purpose of this Report is to create an evidence-based blueprint for transformative change, promoting better joined-up working between departments.

The elephant in the room

1.48 A final note by way of introduction: coursing through this whole Report is the elephant in the room — namely, the present political climate places a high value on efficiency and cost analysis. The legal system, it is said, should always be low cost and high quality. Reform proposals of family law nowadays inevitably involve an assessment of the cost implications. We were conscious of the almost Malthusian gap ever widening between the need for better support services and the capability of government to deliver them all, free and on demand. Doubtless, some of the recommendations proposed in this Report will cost money. It is crucial, however, to appreciate the difference between investment to save and pure expenditure. Whilst some of these recommendations may involve short-term expenditure, they should and must be seen as investment that, in the medium and longer term, will secure untold public savings in terms of current wasted expenditure and, more significantly, human misery. Most importantly, they will profoundly enhance the welfare of children.

Current context

2.1 This Review was not undertaken in isolation. Our intention always was that it should take account of other initiatives that are planned or already under way by the Northern Ireland departments within the civil and family justice sphere and elsewhere. This Report’s recommendations should complement those initiatives as far as possible, thereby acknowledging the respective roles of the executive, legislative and judicial arms of government.

2.2 Lord Justice Gillen met senior judicial colleagues involved in a number of reviews that took place recently in England and Wales, Scotland and the Republic of Ireland, including the Report of the Scottish Civil Courts Review published in 2009, the review of family justice in England and Wales led by Sir David Norgrove, which considered issues in the family justice system in 2010, Lord Briggs’s Civil Courts Structure Review: Final Report, the Civil Justice Council’s report on online dispute resolution for low-value civil claims and Sir Brian Leveson’s Review of Efficiency in Criminal Proceedings. In the Republic of Ireland, the Child Care Law Reporting Project was set up in November 2012 under newly made regulations arising out of the Child Care (Amendment) Act 2007, which provided for the reporting of the proceedings of child care courts, subject to maintaining the anonymity of the families and children concerned, and has recently reported. He was grateful to them for being so generous with their time and for their willingness to share the thinking behind their conclusions with him.

2.3 Lord Justice Gillen took the opportunity at an early stage to discuss the terms of reference for the Review with the ministers in the Northern Ireland Executive whose portfolios included family justice responsibilities, and he found those discussions to be extremely constructive. He invited ministers to put forward senior officials to represent their departments on the Review Group, and their nominees’ contributions proved to be invaluable.

2.4 There are three departments with civil or family justice functions:

- In the Department of Finance, the civil law reform division of the Departmental Solicitor’s Office is responsible for certain aspects of civil law reform, most notably with regard to private family law, trusts and property law, tort, contract law and private international law. The civil law reform division also provides a Northern Ireland input into UK-wide primary and secondary legislative initiatives in the civil law field; contributes to the UK response to developments in international law; contributes to progress reports in respect of international conventions and treaties; provides for the regulation of the legal professions; and monitors civil case law.
The Department of Health (DoH) has policy responsibility for public family law — that is, for cases involving children in care. This includes dealing with issues such as parental contact and adoption. The department also has responsibilities relevant to this Review in respect of policy on mental health and mental capacity and on the safeguarding of children and vulnerable adults.

The Department of Justice (DoJ) has a range of responsibilities in relation to the administration of civil justice, such as the jurisdiction of the courts and allocation of proceedings, access to civil legal aid and civil orders. The Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service, which is an agency of the DoJ, supports the independent judiciary by providing administrative support for Northern Ireland’s courts and tribunals and maintaining the court estate.

2.5 The local initiatives that the Review Group and the Reference Group considered to be of particular relevance to this Review are as follows:

- The guide to case management in public law proceedings (2009), Northern Ireland Legal Services Commission.
- ‘Practice Guidance in the Use of Experts in Public Cases’, issued in 2014 by the Northern Ireland Guardian Ad Litem Agency and the Health and Social Care Board.
- The Access to Justice Review Northern Ireland: The Report (2011) highlighted a number of systemic and policy issues in the family field impacting on the quality and costs of access to justice and recommended a fundamental review of family justice in Northern Ireland.
- A scoping exercise undertaken jointly by the DoJ and DoH in response to the 2011 Report looked critically at the findings of the Norgrove Review in England and Wales.
- The Northern Ireland care proceedings pilot for improving children’s lives will test information gathered in for the purpose of tackling undue delay in public law proceedings. The aspiration is that many of the recommendations set out in this Report will be treated as reasonably practicable in the course of the pilot scheme. This scheme is only in its infancy, and the research carried out, together with the conclusions, may have a profound effect on public law matters. Hopefully, the work will be considered by the recommended new Family Justice Board that this Review hopes to bring forward.¹
- A small claims mediation pilot was under development before this Review was launched. The aim of the pilot was to test the concept of a supported mediation facility in the family courts. However, it was agreed to defer the pilot and look for the potential in mediation in the small claims court as part of the Civil and Family Justice Review.

• A Strategy for Access to Justice: The Report of Access to Justice (2) (‘the Stutt Report’) of September 2015 devoted a considerable part of its findings to the Family Division. Whilst that Report viewed matters from a more cost-driven aspect than this Report, we nonetheless found the comments helpful.

• The adoption and children bill, which DoH is planning to bring forward and which is intended to modernise and reform adoption policy. As noted in the preface to this Report, the Review Group has been careful to respect the boundary between operational matters within the purview of the judiciary and departmental policy responsibilities, and this Report does not, therefore, make any recommendations in respect of adoption policy.

• In addition, we looked at comparable reforms delivered in recent years within the criminal justice system since we believe that some of the learning from these reforms is equally applicable to the civil and family justice system, in particular the provision of information to the public, additional support for vulnerable individuals and the greater use of technology.

• We also welcomed the innovation seminars organised by the Committee for Justice, which were both timely and instructive. The Committee considered innovative practice in other jurisdictions and their applicability in a Northern Ireland context.

2.6 An important theme running through this Review was the need to take full account of the duties placed on the state by relevant international human rights instruments, such as the European Convention on Human Rights, the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child and the UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities. The discussions in the Review Group and the Reference Group were well attuned to these considerations, and the Review was embraced as a positive opportunity to promote the rights of those who engage with the civil and family justice system, with a particular focus on the most vulnerable.

2.7 Since we are aware that The Executive Office has consulted on a Programme for Government but it remains in draft, it is our hope that this Review will inform the future strategic direction of the implementation of reforms to the civil and family justice system by the relevant departments by creating a shared blueprint for the future delivery of civil and family justice, and that it will facilitate a more joined-up approach to the provision of services to the citizen, supported by a common vision.

Legislative context

2.8 Any reforms to family justice in Northern Ireland must be seen in the statutory context of The Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995. It followed the Children Act 1989 in reforming child law. When the Children Act was introduced, it was described by the then Lord Chancellor as ‘the most comprehensive and far reaching reform of child law which has come before Parliament in living memory’.²

2.9 This law swept away the main sources of child law previously applied. It also introduced some new concepts such as ‘parental responsibility’ as the core parental right, with attendant responsibility. The guiding principles in art. 3 of the new Children Order were clear in their emphasis: namely that the child’s welfare shall be the paramount consideration.

2.10 A checklist of considerations was also introduced to guide decision-making in what is known as the welfare checklist — art. 3(3) refers. Further, in art. 3(2), the ‘no delay’ principle found a specific statutory voice in that the legislation clearly set out that the ‘court shall have regard to the general principle that any delay in determining a child-related question is likely to prejudice the welfare of the child. Art. 3(5) also made clear that the court should not make an order unless it considers that ‘doing so would be better for the child than making no order at all’.

2.11 The Order set out a new menu of private law orders, namely residence and contact orders, specific issue orders and prohibited steps orders. These are all described in art. 8.

2.12 Further important provisions are found in art. 13 dealing with change of a child’s name and removal from the jurisdiction. Orders for financial relief were introduced in art. 15 and contained in sch. 1 to the Order.

2.13 It was clear, with welfare as the paramount consideration in the legislation, that the voice of the child would be raised. This sentiment echoes international conventions such as the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child, which was adopted in 1989, and the human rights convention, which was enacted by the Human Rights Act 1998. These legal instruments have led to a development of the law where the child is placed centrally and where the voice of the child must be heard in deciding disputes. The Human Rights Act 1998 has also allowed parents and others with rights to family life to assert their rights within a court setting, and hence there has been an increase in litigation.

2.14 The Children Order also saw the advent of case management in proceedings in an effort to streamline the increasing number of cases before the courts. The Review addressed this issue with an eye to further managing cases across court tiers in an effective and consistent manner. The Review looked at how the more effective use of technology can remedy some of the problems in this area.

2.15 The issue of repeat applications, particularly for contact, is also addressed. Finally, the issue of no order within the legislation reminds us that solutions found among families should be preferred, which leads to a consideration of mediation and other alternative dispute resolution prior to litigation.

2.16 The Children Order is not the only source of children’s law in Northern Ireland. In dealing with divorce and separation, there are other statutes that govern proceedings, such as the Matrimonial Causes (Northern Ireland) Order 1978. Children are obviously affected by divorce and ancillary relief (resolution of financial issues after divorce), so this Review looked at these areas under the private law heading.
2.17 In particular, consideration was given to whether some no-fault divorces could be dealt with more simply and also whether there is any scope for changing the system dealing with ancillary relief to make it more efficient. In this regard, consideration was given to alternative dispute resolution and the use of technology, including online technology.

2.18 A root-and-branch consideration of the Children Order was outside the remit of this Review, but clearly some of the changes we recommend will require statutory change. It is perhaps time, however, for a government-based multidisciplinary body to be set up to consider the workings of this Order given that it is now over 20 years old.

Current system

3.1 The family justice system is currently made up of the Family Proceedings Court (FPC), the Family Care Centre (FCC) and the High Court. Most proceedings begin in the FPC, unless a higher court has previously made decisions in the case. Large numbers of cases are listed daily in both the FPC and the FCC. These are mixed lists that include private and public law cases involving first directions hearings, interlocutory hearings, reviews and evidential hearings. The most recent statistics are available at appendix 2.

3.2 Repeated review hearings are the norm and reasons for adjournments are not recorded. Social workers and guardians frequently attend review hearings and may spend large amounts of time waiting for their case to begin. They rarely if at all appear by live link, telephone link or Skype and often travel long distances for what may turn out to be brief hearings. The decision to transfer a case to a higher tier on grounds of complexity may be made after proceedings have been continuing for many months.

3.3 A new legal aid process begins if a case is transferred to a different tier. Proceedings are generally adversarial rather than inquisitorial in nature. The lawyers take the lead in deciding the issues and the judge assumes the role of ‘referee’. It may take many months for the real issues in a case to be apparent and appropriate assessments undertaken. Where experts are required, the legal aid procedures can be perceived as bureaucratic and lacking in transparency. Parallel planning is generally not undertaken by the health and social care trusts.

3.4 In the past there was no cohesion between the three judicial tiers. There was no formal communication structure for family judges, nor was there any training structure in place. Currently, under the spur of the Senior Family Judge, there are structured joint training sessions for family judges two or three times a year, and it is hoped that this can be built on with the passage of time. However, there is still no reliable management information available to the judiciary to enable effective case management. Notwithstanding this, there is generally judicial continuity throughout the system, which is a major plus factor.

3.5 It is acknowledged that proceedings relating to children take too long and that the system is riddled with avoidable delay at every stage.

3.6 Proceedings are often convened in the same building and on the same occasions as criminal trials are ongoing. Such trials at times take priority over family justice cases. Concerns have been raised, for example, by the Women’s Aid Federation that in many courts there is no separate waiting room for women, no separate entrance, women are frequently ‘eyeballed’ by their opposite number whilst waiting in corridors for the case to start, and no special arrangements are provided.
3.7 However it is right to say that more recently it has been observed that some courts are giving over entire weeks to family cases without interruption from other hearings, although this is happening too infrequently, occurring at times one week a month.

3.8 The current system is seeing an increase in litigants in person and family proceedings, particularly private family proceedings. Issues that previously were agreed between counsel or solicitors are not being agreed with the litigants in person, and they may not understand what is being suggested or, on occasions, refuse to engage in case management discussions until the matter comes before the court.

International context

Current developments

4.1 We made it a central tenet of this Review not only to recognise our international obligations but to explore and hopefully learn from the experience of family justice courts outside Northern Ireland. Hence, as outlined in the preface, not only did we visit or make contact with our near neighbours in England and Wales, Scotland, Guernsey and the Republic of Ireland but we set up and engaged in live link conferences with colleagues from the judiciary, the legal professions and legal services communities. We consulted legal and non-legal experts and papers as far afield as New Zealand, Australia, Canada, the USA, South Africa, the Netherlands and Finland. These experiences were invaluable. Family justice problems are fundamentally the same worldwide and such collaboration, so willingly and generously given in every instance, provides a harbinger of the international contacts we recommend be maintained in the future.

4.2 Included in appendix 3 is a document from the Family Bar Association — civil justice review research — which considers in some detail aspects of the family justice systems in Scotland, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Australia and Canada. A short summary now follows.

New Zealand

4.3 The family court has become a last resort when people cannot agree on care of children issues. This is because the court is now part of a wider family justice system that puts more emphasis on people sorting out disputes about caring for children. More out-of-court services will be available to help them to do this, including parenting courses and dispute resolution. This has been achieved whilst maintaining many aspects of the family justice system precisely the same as ours, including, for example, adoption, care and protection, child abduction, mental health, paternity, separation and dissolution (divorce) applications, and powers to act on behalf of others. A similar approach is adopted in Australia.

British Columbia

4.4 British Columbia has been a leading light in initiating online tools for providing dispute resolution to citizens, with most success in small property, zoning disputes and consumer protection cases. Empirical research carried out in British Columbia found that people in family law disputes have an appetite for online tools in their disputes. Seeking solutions online has been driven by a desire to achieve efficiencies and deal with growing resource pressures. Particular use has been found in divorce settlements and dividing up joint property. A February 2012 Green Paper, Modernizing British Columbia’s Justice System, identified tribunals as a simple and less expensive solution to easing delays in the court system.
THE NETHERLANDS

4.5 The Dutch Legal Aid Board came forward in 2006 with an online dispute resolution project, which became the Rechtwijzer (law signpost). This has undergone several transformations in its short life and is very much a work in progress, constantly being developed and enhanced in terms of the services and supports on offer to service users.¹

4.6 Version 2.0 is now launched. It has a particular resonance for online resolutions in divorce and ancillary relief. It purports to be far less costly compared with a regular divorce. The platform guides parties to a ‘high-quality separation covenant’ by offering a ‘dialogue space’ that provides information on legal, financial and practical issues, and tools such as calculators and checklists.

4.7 The parties can select a model solution, adjust one or combine options to fit their specific system, or draft one themselves. Once they reach an agreement, the solution will automatically be transferred to the covenant section. If people get stuck, they can either call in the help of an online mediator who will facilitate a problem-solving process or call in an online adjudicator who will give a binding decision on the specific issue. For now, Rechtwijzer offers only mediation and adjudication services. Later on it will offer other services such as financial expertise, psychological help and children support.

4.8 Once the parties have worked through the tasks and have the draft covenant ready, they are obliged to submit it to the ‘reviewer’. This mandatory step aims to guarantee the quality of the covenant. The online review is done by a lawyer specialised in divorce cases, who will take the case to court — in the case of marriages and registered partnerships with minor children — or draft the final contract if the separation does not have to go to court. Currently, 900 family cases are being processed, with 300 having been completed.

SCOTLAND AND GUERNSEY

4.9 The law in relation to children in Northern Ireland mirrors that applied in England and Wales as The Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995 and the Children Act 1989 are largely the same. The same system operates throughout much of the United Kingdom, and a large body of case law has developed. The jurisdiction in Scotland is different and it has been adopted in Guernsey.

4.10 Thus, for example, the law in Guernsey comes from the Children (Guernsey and Alderney) Law, 2008. The most significant difference from our system is in relation to care proceedings. The new law set up a system whereby a Children’s Convenor (CC) is appointed. They are a public appointment with the responsibility of deciding whether there are grounds in law for legal measures to be taken. This is called the ‘care requirement’. The case may then be referred to the Child Youth and Community Tribunal (CYCT). Anyone can refer a child’s case to the CYCT but most referrals come from social services or the police.

4.11 The CC can request reports and he or she decides if no action is needed, if the child should be referred for voluntary services or if there should be a referral to the CYCT. The CYCT is a tribunal made up of three law members who are chosen from the community and appear voluntarily. A safeguarder can be appointed to protect the child’s interests. The CYCT proceeds to decide if the parents or carers and the child have accepted the grounds for the referral. Any disputed facts are referred to a court, and judges also retain powers to make emergency orders. As the CYCT does not deal with disputes of fact, legal aid is not available for legal representation at hearings. The CYCT may make a care requirement upon approving a plan. This is an order that places a child or young person under the supervisory care of the state. The care requirement lasts for 12 months but can be renewed. It ceases to have effect once a child reaches the age of 18 or can be terminated when the CYCT decides that compulsory measures are no longer necessary. Appeals may be lodged from the decision within 21 days.

Discussion

4.12. The remit of this Review did not permit an in-depth investigation and analysis of all or any of these systems in other jurisdictions. As this Report reveals, however, they did trigger a number of ideas that influenced our thought processes on a wide range of issues. This all serves to illustrate that, if we are to provide the best system possible for families and children, our horizons must be broadened and our understanding of other jurisdictions deepened. There is no reason why we should be merely late followers of that which emerges in our nearest neighbours.

4.13 Thus, for example, whilst we currently favour the judge-led approach to family justice, that should not exclude a body such as the newly formed Family Justice Board commissioning an in-depth study of the system that operates in Scotland and Guernsey to establish the pros and cons of their CYCT care system. We recognise that the Family Bar Association’s response strongly opposed that system. However, we are equally satisfied that this should not deflect us from investigating this different approach in order to broaden our horizons and learn lessons from one of our closest neighbours. We observe that the Law Society is ‘supportive of the proposal for an in-depth study of the systems which operate in Scotland and Guernsey’ and have noted that in October 2016 the Scottish First Minister at her party conference undertook to carry out a root-and-branch review of Scotland’s children-in-care system, which may also lead to developments within our own system. This is a matter that, for example, the Family Justice Board could keep closely under review.

4.14 In particular, we feel there is much to be said for the view expressed to us by Professor Roger Smith OBE, a freelance researcher and writer, that we should

2 Professor Smith is an expert in domestic and international aspects of legal aid, human rights and access to justice. He writes regularly in the specialist legal press in England and Wales, with regular op-ed pieces in monitor closely developments in the Rechtwijzer and British Columbia systems of online dispute resolution. It is still relatively early days in its development in the family justice arena. It needs careful peer reviewing and informed critical analysis, perhaps, before we would adopt it wholesale into our family justice system, save in no-fault divorce, a task that could be well researched and crystallised by the Family Justice Board.3

4.15 Similarly, we recommend that the concept of total immersion should be adopted with regard to cutting-edge developments in the New World countries of New Zealand and Australia. Whilst we recognise that these systems may be more inquisitorial than our own, nonetheless the cutting-edge developments in these countries may have much to inform us. Hence, we should investigate the possibilities of funding a family judge from Northern Ireland to spend, say, three months in New Zealand or Australia attached to their family division to witness at first hand exactly how their system works and what lessons can be learned and practices adopted from that experience that would cause our courts to perform in a more efficient, less costly and fairer manner. Considering other systems may enable us all the better to take a fresh look at our own.

4.16 We recommend that the newly appointed Family Justice Board should appoint someone with specific responsibility for keeping the judiciary and the legal profession up to date with family justice developments throughout the world, building, for example, on the contacts made during this Review. The Family Bar Association suggested an alternative might be to appoint a research assistant working for the Judicial Studies Board to carry out such work.

4.17 We also recommend that the family judiciary and the legal profession be strongly encouraged to remain au fait with case law and developments in these wider jurisdictions, where appropriate. Arguably, our researches for legal cases can be too constrained and parochial, bereft of international input. Long gone are the days when a member of the judiciary could express the view that ‘there is no law in family cases’.

4.18 None of this is to ignore the work that is being done by, for example, the Law Society, which provides a child and family law update published twice yearly; the Bar Library current awareness service, which allows practitioners to benefit from a weekly email bulletin that includes practice areas; specific case law and legislation alerts, journal abstracts and citations and relevant online news; and the Bar Council’s continuing professional development, which focuses on approving the quality of the training on offer to counsel. Gatherings such as the annual Four Jurisdictions Family Law Conference are also invaluable. Nonetheless, a fresh emphasis on developments in wider jurisdictions is now a further key component of a well-informed justice system.

Recommendations

1. The relevant Executive department or the new Family Justice Board to commission an in-depth study of the systems that operate in Scotland and Guernsey to establish the pros and cons of their Child Youth and Community Tribunal care system. [FJ1]

2. Close monitoring of developments in the Rechtwijzer system of online dispute resolution in the Netherlands and British Columbia relevant to the family justice system, supervised by the Family Justice Board. [FJ2]

3. Close monitoring of the ‘court of last resort’ approach to problem-solving courts in New Zealand and Australia. [FJ3]

4. Liaison arrangements to be initiated whereby a family judge from Northern Ireland will spend, say, three months in New Zealand or Australia attached to their family division, and thereafter to report on what lessons can be learned and practices introduced into the family system in Northern Ireland. [FJ4]

5. The Lord Chief Justice to appoint a family judge with specific responsibility for keeping the judiciary and the legal profession up to date with family justice developments throughout the world. [FJ5]

6. The family judiciary and the legal profession to be strongly encouraged to keep abreast of family justice case law and developments in other jurisdictions. [FJ6]

Single-tier system

Current position

5.1 The current family court divisions and the transfer arrangements between the various family courts were identified as a major cause of delay and inefficiency. It surfaced, for example, as a source of complaint by the public on the website that we set up for this Review and by the legal profession, with allegations of numerous court sittings in lower courts before a decision is eventually made to apply to transfer the case upwards, where the whole process starts anew.

5.2 Allocation in Northern Ireland is made under the provisions of the Children (Allocation of Proceedings) Order (Northern Ireland) 1996. The initial allocation decision is now made on paper by an allocation judge, with a right of oral reconsideration before the same judge or another allocation judge. A case management appeal will lie from an allocation decision made after oral reconsideration, and provision is expected to be made for case management appeals to be heard quickly. Designated family judges, with a specific management and leadership role, are responsible for the overall allocation policy in the Family Care Centre. Thereafter, decisions to transfer cases on grounds of complexity are dealt with informally within the Family Care Centre.

5.3 Currently, there is a perception that there really are too many Crown Court centres. In most cases Crown Court hearings take up the vast majority of the hearing time of county court judges. The high profile accorded to criminal cases in the county courts is detrimental to the hearing of civil and family cases in terms of finding any or consecutive hearing days and timely hearings on the days assigned, although in some areas one week per month is being specifically assigned to family work.

5.4 A single-entry system has been implemented in the family courts in England pursuant to the Crime and Courts Act 2013. For the reasons set out in this Report, we consider that it is appropriate in the Family Division in Northern Ireland. In England people now send their applications to their nearest family court point of entry. There is no longer a separate jurisdiction for magistrates’ courts and county courts to hear family cases. The new single family court deals with all family proceedings, except for a limited number of matters that are exclusively reserved to the High Court. The suggestion was that the High Court judges would lead by example, providing precedent on the ground and thereby impressing good practice on all levels of judges and magistrates in the new family court.¹

5.5 The Family Bar Association’s response raised the question of further research and assessment of the single-tier system in England. However, the fact of the matter is that the concept was researched in England for the family justice review in 2011, the final report of which recommended its implementation, and it has now been operating in England for several years. The Justice Statistics Analytical Services indicated that no policy or research analysis or review has been conducted of how successful the single family court has been in terms of speeding up of disposal of cases etc. However, contacts with various family judges in England indicated a universal approval of the working of the system over the past four years. The change is intended to create a simpler court system, allowing cases to be allocated to the judge, with the relevant level of seniority to hear the case, with the help of a ‘gatekeeping’ team. Their function is to review and allocate each new case to an appropriate level of judge (including magistrates) at an appropriate hearing centre. This means that practitioners are no longer able to select the venue or tier of judge. The changes were implemented only recently but are intended to reduce delays and ensure judicial continuity. This abolition of the equivalent Family Proceedings Court (FPC) and Family Care Centre (FCC) in England and Wales and the creation of a single family court, with the jurisdiction of the High Court preserved, to date has been a very positive development.

5.6 In England and Wales, where a single-tier provision applies, provision is made for a unified procedure applying to all appeals other than appeals to the Court of Appeal — that is, appeals to the family court and the High Court. Within the family court, appeals from a district court to a judge require permission from the first instance judge. An application for permission to appeal may be made either to the lower court at the hearing at which the decision was made or to the appeal court in the appeal notice. As a matter of good practice, the application should be made to the court below in the first instance. Where the lower court refuses permission, a further application may be made to the appeal court. Where the appeal court refuses permission on paper, the appellant may within seven days request an oral hearing to reconsider the decision. The test for giving permission to appeal is that either

- The court considers that the appeal would have a real prospect of success; or
- There is some other compelling reason why the appeal should be heard.²

Where permission is granted, it may limit the issues to be heard and may impose conditions.

5.7 We recommend that a similar system be invoked in this jurisdiction. In short, appeals from district judges or Family Care Centre judges should require leave of the first instance judge. If that application is refused, it can be renewed before the appeal judge but that will be determined on paper in first place. If that is refused, the appellant may within seven days request an oral hearing to reconsider the decision. The test for giving permission to appeal should be precisely the same as in England — namely, that the appeal has a real prospect of success or there is some other compelling reason why the appeal should be heard. Where permission is granted, it may limit the issues to be heard and may impose conditions.

5.8 Clearly, an appeal from a judge in the unified family court will still lie to the Court of Appeal. Once again permission to appeal should, as in England, be required. Where this constitutes a second appeal, there should be an additional requirement for the appellant — namely, he must establish that

- the appeal would raise an important point of principle or practice; or
- there is some other reason for the court to hear it.

5.9 Currently, no provision is made for a variation of an order made on appeal by the first instance judge. A classic example of this is where the appeal court has made a contact order, the slightest variation in that Appeal Court order now has to go back to the Appeal Court judge. There should be an amendment to the legislation to permit the High Court judge to refer the matter back to the court of first instance at the discretion of the High Court judge after a consideration by them of the appeal on the papers.

Responses

5.10 The responses to our proposal for a single-tier system in our preliminary family justice review indicated a broad-based widespread approval. For example, the Northern Ireland Guardian Ad Litem Agency, the Belfast Health and Social Care Trust, Family Mediation Northern Ireland, the Northern Ireland Social Care Council, the Belfast Solicitors’ Association, the Children’s Commissioner and VOYPIC (Voice of Young People in Care) etc. all expressed approval.

5.11 The Law Society, whilst indicating that it saw the benefits of one unified set of rules applying in all family courts, was concerned about increased bureaucracy and the need for further research. The Bar Council was opposed to the creation of a single family court in Northern Ireland, and its reasoning can be summarised as follows:

- delays in allocation of cases rest at the feet of the judiciary, and the answer is better training for the judiciary and the need for allocation applications to be dealt with before Family Care Centre judges;
- there is a danger that serious cases would be kept within the new Family Care Centres and appropriate cases will not be transferred to the High Court;
- already legal aid is rarely if at all granted in the Family Proceedings Courts, and this trend could now continue to the single-tier system;
- a limitation of three locations for such courts outside Belfast would create problems for people in rural areas travelling to them;
- insufficient resources will be available; and
- more time is required to consider the development in England.
Discussion

5.12 We are strongly in favour of such a development in Northern Ireland. In our view, there is no downside to such a step, and it is replete with advantages in a system in which all family judges are extremely experienced.

- It supports the notion of family judges working side by side, preferably in one building, allocating cases for determination immediately they are into the system. The concerns of lay magistrates would be allayed because they would continue to participate in appropriate cases precisely as they do at the moment.

- It aids flexible transfers/allocations and removes the need for time-consuming physical transfers from one division to another in different locations, with attendant rights of appeal against transfers etc.

- In the event of the case being of sufficient complexity, it permits a swift informal transfer to the High Court whereas under the present system of allocation this can take up to perhaps eight weeks or more.

- A single judge — not a civil servant — will be responsible for allocation once the case enters the system, allowing for a speedy first hearing. This judge might be a county court judge, a district judge or perhaps a combination of both. The High Court, probably confined to only one family judge since it would be the receptacle only for those rare cases deemed to be exceptionally complex or with an international aspect, would have the power to reallocate in the event of an unsuitable case having been referred to it.

- The High Court will, of course, continue to hear cases of complexity (legally or factually) or with an international hue. The High Court thus will typically hear complex freeing order cases or non-accidental injury cases etc. That court will also have the power to reallocate matters in the event of an unsuitable case having been referred to it. Applications by lawyers to allocate cases to the High Court and to challenge an allocation that has already been made will require to be formalised in writing. The Senior Family Judge will therefore be in a position to review such applications periodically to determine whether cases are systemically being disproportionately retained in the lower tier (or the converse).

- It will end the current delay endemic in a system where belatedly one tier decides to transfer a case to another tier long after it has first been processed.

- Judges in these centres would no longer feel isolated and discussions about the appropriate listing would become a shared task.

- There is no reason why this should be a costly exercise, provided two elements are recognised. First, there must be a willingness to recognise that this is part of the overall expenditure necessary to introduce IT throughout the system. Secondly, sufficient members of the judiciary are to be made available to service these centres. In truth, the concentration in three or four centres would allow for an accompanying concentration of resources. Thus, as the Women’s Aid Federation requested, these three or four courts would be fully equipped with waiting areas for women, special measure provisions would be made available, there would perhaps be separate entrances for women, and the centres would be fully IT-resourced. In addition, the one-stop shop resource (see chapter 6) can also be concentrated in these courts rather than dispersed across a variety of other courts. All of this will lead to swifter determinations, fewer court sittings, less wasted court time and better outcomes.

- A single family court will promote a greater sense of cohesion and improve links with all members of the family judiciary.
- It will provide greater clarity for the public and more effective working within the judiciary, leading to greater efficiency.
- The current situation in which each separate division has jurisdiction to hear cases only within a specific type of family court to which it has been assigned leads to inflexibility.

5.13 This proposal would also have the added advantage of elevating the civil and family work from what is now regarded as ‘second-class relations’, with cases regularly being adjourned or part-heard, and extending over lengthy periods because of the pressures of criminal trials. The problems may arise in terms of the court estate. There are very few multi-courtroom venues, and facilities are poor in some locations. It should be possible to solve these problems with a degree of rationalisation of how cases are to be heard and some structural alterations.

5.14 The concept of civil and family centres may also be a boost to recruitment to the county and district judges tiers in that, currently, civil practitioners may be deflected from applying for these posts because of the over-concentration on criminal cases, which is currently 80% or thereabouts of county court work. A single-tier system would be accompanied by judges specially assigned to civil and family work for perhaps renewable periods of three years.

5.15 One way of implementing this would be to establish three or four civil and family centres. It could coincide with the three new administrative court divisions: north eastern, south eastern and western. On the other hand, there is a lot to be said for attempting to marry up our FCCs with health and social care (HSC) trust boundaries not only in public law cases but in private law cases, with court children’s officers based in trust areas (although it is less critical in private law cases). The Dungannon FPC and FCC is a good example of problems as the division is split between the Northern and Southern HSC Trusts. Other problems exist in the family system: the movement of Limavady into Causeway Coast and Glens Borough Council means that the FCC is Belfast as opposed to Londonderry or Coleraine (Limavady starts on the eastern edge of Eglinton).

5.16 The problems might be solved using the trust areas: Laganside (Belfast and South Eastern), Coleraine (Northern), Craigavon (Southern) and Omagh or Londonderry (Western). However, we must always be conscious of access to justice and remember that, outside of greater Belfast, public transport is not always very good. Careful thought and consideration, with wide consultation, would be necessary before designating the respective locations.

5.17 In Belfast, the Old Town Hall would have the potential to develop as a civil and family centre and, indeed, we understand that this is being considered as an option in the context of the wider Department of Justice estate strategy.

5.18 Already parties in the High Court have to travel all over Northern Ireland in order to attend cases in Belfast. There will now be fewer cases in the High Court, with the reduced numbers being heard in more convenient provincial centres. With a measure of flexibility built into the system, there is no reason why, in special circumstances, the civil and family centres could not sit in an available court more locally if it were to become available. This would be particularly convenient if, for example, a Crown Court judge were to see a list collapse, and they might be available to assist in family work, as happens currently. Moreover, there is no reason why, as occurs in serious criminal cases, from time to time a High Court judge could not travel to and sit in one of these civil and family centres where an appropriately complex case had been assigned to the High Court.

5.19 As we indicated earlier in this Report, the reduction in legal aid in England and Wales has been a major contributor in limiting true access to justice for people in the family courts. It would be a disaster if this policy were to be followed in Northern Ireland and if the civil and family centres were to be bereft of legal aid for barristers and/or solicitors. There is no reason whatsoever why this should happen and certainly no indication was given to us to suggest that it will occur.

Recommendations

1. The abolition of the equivalent Family Proceedings Court and Family Care Centre in Northern Ireland and the creation of a single family court, with the jurisdiction of the High Court preserved only for the most complex or legally sensitive cases. This will require legislation. [FJ7]

2. Careful consideration must be given to the location of such venues, after wide consultation, to ensure true access to justice is maintained in terms of ability to travel to court. [FJ8]

3. Leave should be required for appeals from judges in the unified family court. Where the appeal court has been asked to reconsider a refusal of leave by the first instance judge, and the appeal court refuses permission on paper, the appellant may request an oral hearing to reconsider the decision. The test for giving permission to appeal should be either
   - the court considers that the appeal would have a real prospect of success; or
   - there is some other compelling reason why the appeal should be heard. [FJ9]

Support services and the one-stop shop

CURRENT POSITION

6.1 We have to recognise that in some instances the dynamics and emotions of family separation make the current system of adversarial litigation inappropriate. It is predicated on a win/lose outcome that can drag on interminably. In, for example, child contact or residence issues and divorce cases, the process can increase tensions between the parties, tensions that do not go away after the court process is completed. At the first directions hearing, practitioners often identify issues to be resolved that require support services, but currently these simply are not readily available within the system.

DISCUSSION

6.2 It is incumbent upon us to create a paradigm shift in Northern Ireland, where access to professional support for dysfunctional parental relationships and separating parents becomes the cultural norm instead of immediate recourse to the full lengthy legal process to resolve parental and family relationships. We need a new joined-up approach that will begin to educate and empower parents to take responsibility for their circumstance and build their resilience and their families’ resilience so that they can chart a future course that lessens the impact on the emotional and mental health well-being of their families. This is an idea whose time has come. It straddles the public services. For example, in health recently, the then Minister of Health, Michelle O’Neill, in Health and Wellbeing 2026: Delivering Together, espoused precisely the same concept of prioritisation and early intervention in health matters to ensure that people stay well.

6.3 A key component of such a novel approach is the robust introduction of a one-stop shop concept at first directions hearings, where the judge is both resourced and empowered to consider invoking the assistance of

- available and adequately resourced court children’s officers (CCOs);
- relationship counselling;
- parent education;
- debt counselling;
- addiction or anger management support;
- drug and alcohol testing;

1 Family Mediation Northern Ireland (FMNI) reports that the independent counselling service in schools in Northern Ireland indicates that family break-ups are one of the biggest issues that children are discussing in their counselling sessions.
• pre-mediation support;
• mediation sessions;
• contact centre referrals; and
• the use of specialist courts such as a family drug and alcohol court.2

6.4 If the case has reached court, a judge at an early stage — preferably at a first directions hearing — should identify the relevant problems in the case before them and have available (for online contact or physically in court) these services to enable them to direct resolutions to the individual problems. This is manifestly the optimum solution for many family justice problems if we are genuinely to embrace the concept of problem-solving courts.

6.5 Research undertaken by Relate in 2015 found that 23% of the Northern Ireland public have experienced a breakdown of their parents’ relationship. By enhancing parental and family well-being, the service will help to reduce

- loss of parental working hours;
- litigation costs;
- court hearings;
- pressure on health services and household budgets;
- behavioural problems that impact on children; and
- poor attendance rates at school.

6.6 The one-stop shop concept could be a classic example of the new cooperative, joined-up approach that this Review invites between courts and all the governmental and non-governmental multidisciplinary bodies, acting in tandem in the best interests of children, with huge potential saving in terms of eliminating the current waste of public funds in interminable court hearings.

6.7 If there were dedicated services with set fees, consideration could be given to automatic legal aid authority if the court so directed. This would avoid delay in sourcing the appropriate provider and obtaining legal aid authority. It would allow early directions to be swiftly and efficiently implemented.

6.8 We recognise that ‘automatic’ entitlement to legal aid, with or without the court’s direction, does present problems. Financial eligibility needs to be considered. Moreover, therapeutic services such as anger management are not covered by legal aid. Legal aid does on occasion cover some diagnostic work by anger managers but does not cover the therapy. In truth, if a one-stop shop is to be established, proper funding arrangements need to be put in place that will include, but are not limited to, legal aid. Funding from the Department of Health (DoH) would be required to cover some aspects of the work, and health and social care trusts would, therefore, have to liaise with the legal aid authorities to arrive at a fixed fee or set fee approach.

2 See chapter 12.
With goodwill, this should not be a massive hurdle given the endless long-term benefits and savings it would bring about. We note, for example, the funding that the Legal Services Agency (LSA) provides to the Housing Rights Service, based on an assumed instance of assistance, and both the LSA and the trusts should approach the matter on a similar basis.

6.9 At present, knowledge of services available continues to be poor amongst professionals, despite the Government’s Family Support NI website. A fully independent, early intervention one-stop shop, funded across departments, and legal aid will begin the process of changing the way we think about parenting in the family justice system. The cultural norms of Northern Ireland require to be challenged and supports put in place to cope with modern 21st-century family life. The CCOs, the Official Solicitor, the client’s legal representative and social services are all experts who can map the best way forward, sourcing other support services so as to best assist the judge to grip and solve the issues from the outset.

6.10 The proposed early intervention one-stop shop courts would chime with and, by implication, contribute significantly to:

- DoH Families Matter strategy.
- The proposed 10-year strategy for children and young people.
- The five health and social care trusts’ core business of keeping children safe.
- The key themes contained in both the Health and Social Care Board’s and local commissioning groups’ plans.
- The new early intervention transformation programme.
- The Department of Justice’s (DoJ) aims to provide appropriate alternatives to court and protect vulnerable families.
- The Stutt recommendation of early resolution certificates, which could include mediation.3 Whilst the Stutt recommendation does not articulate a one-stop shop concept, nonetheless his recommendation may actually work within the spirit of the one-stop shop concept, subject to appropriate funding mechanisms for assistance not covered by legal aid.
- The approach currently adopted by the European Court of Human Rights in a recent decision4 dealing with the obligations on the state to take steps to allow children to live with their parents.

4 Soares de Melo v Portugal App no 72850/14 (ECtHR, 16 February 2016). The court found there to be a breach of the family’s art. 8 rights when seven (of 10) children were removed from the mother’s care with a view to adoption on the grounds of the mother’s poverty and refusal to undergo sterilisation. There was no evidence of any neglect or of physical, emotional or sexual abuse of the children by their mother. The court observed that the state authorities had not offered any financial support to meet the children’s basic needs in terms of food, electricity and running water or to cover childcare costs so that Ms Soares de Melo could take up paid employment. The court considered that the authorities should first have taken practical steps to allow the children to live with their mother before it had placed them in care, especially as there were no signs of violent
The current Home on Time assessment scheme, which is now advanced by all trusts in Northern Ireland. It involves placing a child with concurrent carers who are approved to foster and adopt children in the event that those children cannot return to the birth family. The thrust of the scheme is to reach decisions about the future of children earlier and avoid multiple disruptive placements of children, which can be very damaging to them. The birth parent is assured of intensive work to address whatever the areas of concern are during the assessment. There is also regular contact for the parent with the child for the duration of the assessment. If sufficient progress is made, the parent is better placed to seek the return of the child. If such progress is not made within a reasonable time, the concurrent carers are more likely to become long-term carers and potentially adoptive parents, provided the placement of the child with them is progressing satisfactorily. The scheme is not activated in cases in which the prospects for the parents are regarded as hopeless by trusts. It is used only in cases in which social workers have very serious concerns about the parent’s ability to provide an acceptable level of care for the child within a reasonable time frame but recognise that there is at least some prospect of parental progress. Accordingly, the scheme gives a parent the opportunity to prove that, with appropriate advice and support, they can make and maintain improvement to a sufficient degree to provide good enough long-term consistent parenting for the child.\footnote{A Health and Social Care Trust v C [2017] NIFAM 5.}

6.11 None of this should underestimate the current work of the court children’s officers. It is invaluable. All of the responses we received that addressed this matter, together with the district judges to whom we spoke, were at pains to emphasise how critical the services of a properly resourced CCO service are to the early resolution of private law cases. It is necessary to be conscious of the pressure on CCOs and the need for more of them in the system. If CCOs are not available, cases will often commence the drift through adjournments. It requires the CCO to be properly available to the court rather than just to the lawyers. We consider that their role is so important that there should be at least one available in every family court centre. This should also apply in the High Court, with someone possibly seconded from the Family Care Centre (FCC) or the Family Proceedings Court (FPC) now sitting in Laganside, when necessary.

RESPONSES TO THE ONE-STOP SHOP CONCEPT

6.12 Without exception, every response that we received on this topic was favourable and urged its implementation. There is, therefore, universal approval of such a concept right across the family justice vista, including the Bar Council, the Law Society, the Belfast Solicitors’ Association, the Children’s Commissioner, the Northern Ireland Lay Magistrates’ Association, the Northern Ireland Social Care Council, Relate Northern Ireland and the Northern Ireland Guardian Ad Litem Agency (NIGALA).

\footnote{conduct, mistreatment or sexual abuse noted. The parents had not been found to have any health or mental health concerns, and the Family Court had observed a particularly strong emotional bond between the children and their mother. The court ordered an award of €15,000 for non-pecuniary damage.}
6.13  Responsibly, the Bar of Northern Ireland urged caution as to the details provided in the referral if there are issues that require determination by the court in the first place. Thus, if there are disputed facts — for example, domestic violence or non-accidental injuries or allegations of sexual abuse — the court may have to direct fact-finding hearings before such resources are identified. Moreover, once again the potential cost of this concept raises its head given the pressures at present experienced by professional support services working with parents to address dysfunctional relationships and enhance family well-being. Services are already overstretched, with long waiting times in certain instances.

6.14  This is a classic case of investing to save. Provided it is properly resourced, it can fundamentally change the way we approach parenting in a family justice system and save countless hours of wasted court time and unnecessary expense, not to mention the benefits to children and parents, which can prevent the long-term damage that now often occurs.

Contact breakdown

CURRENT POSITION

6.15  Problems arising out of contact with children play a major role in the private law system. If difficulties occur over contact for a parent with a child, the current system requires the parent to file an application with their local FPC in hard copy with the original birth certificates. The application must be served by a summons server and listed by the court.

6.16  The responses that we received on this topic correctly emphasise the need to interpret ‘stopping contact’ in a flexible manner. The concept must also include instances where contact has been drastically reduced albeit not stopped or where it has been subjected to disproportionate restrictions by the parent with care. This process serves to delay access to justice in non-emergency situations. For example, there is currently a four- to six-week delay in receiving a first directions date from the date of lodging an application in Belfast FPC. In a case where contact with a child has been stopped by one parent, this could result in eight to 12 weeks with no contact, taking into account the time it takes for service, obtaining legal advice, sending pre-proceedings correspondence and applying for legal aid, if eligible.

DISCUSSION

6.17  With our emphasis on outcomes-based approaches and problem-solving courts, we recommend more, or more efficient, sittings with a triage system, where a case in which contact had been taking place and has stopped is immediately identified, fast-tracked and given priority. Rigorous observation and enforcement of this system would reduce the time it is currently taking for the case to reach court. For it to succeed, of course, it would be necessary that corresponding arrangements be made with the LSA to ensure priority is given to minimising processing times. It would also be necessary to ensure that every contact case did not fall into this category, which would defeat the purpose of the accelerated exercise and delay the hearing of first applications. Accordingly, as in emergency applications during vacations, counsel or a solicitor would have to certify it as an emergency or early resolution case. The Law Society response reminded us that, in the period from September 2014 to August 2015, the Family Proceedings Courts dealt with over 4,000 private law applications and, therefore, a fairly strict supervision would need to be maintained on the number of cases falling into this category. It also has to be recognised, as a response from Men and Boys Initiative (formerly Men’s Aid NI) pointed out, that this fast-tracking system may well require fact-finding where domestic abuse has been alleged.

6.18 Assertions surfaced through our website that the family courts are too ‘mother- or female-oriented and that fathers are at a disadvantage, particularly in applications for contact or residence.

6.19 Statistics available to us from the Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service (NICTS) seem to refute this assertion in the case of contact applications and do not cause us to make any recommendation to address the matter. These statistics are as follows.

Contact applications (68 by females and 248 by males) that were dealt with in 2014 were sampled:

- 29 (9%) were found in favour of a female;
- 184 (58%) were found in favour of a male;
- 2 (1%) resulted in a joint contact order; and
- 101 (32%) were withdrawn, dismissed or struck out.

Of the 68 female applicants:

- 20 were found in favour of the female applicant (29%);
- 24 were found in favour of the male respondent (35%);
- 1 resulted in no contact order being made, but a joint residence order was made (1%); and
- 23 were withdrawn, dismissed or struck out (34%).

Of the 248 male applicants:

- 160 were found in favour of the male applicant (65%);
- 9 were found in favour of the female respondent (4%); and
- 79 were withdrawn, dismissed or struck out (32%).

Contact orders and child arrangements in the context of domestic violence

CURRENT POSITION

6.20 In England and Wales there is a current perception that there exists a presumption that a father (or, for that matter, a mother) must have contact with a child even where there is clear evidence of domestic abuse impacting on the child of the other parent so that they are put at risk.

6.21 This may well spring from amendments to the Children Act 1989 at s. 1(2B), which introduces a presumption that the involvement of a parent in a child’s life furthers the child’s welfare. This has clearly been seen as strengthening the established judicial approach that, in principle, mothers and fathers have equal rights and responsibilities.

6.22 We do not have such a provision in Northern Ireland in The Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995, hence the perception that exists in England may not exist here.

6.23 To address the problems that were arising in England in the wake of some important reports and a public debate and concern generated by them, Women’s Aid published an important paper on the subject in January 2016. The publication of that report was followed by a parliamentary hearing convened by the all-party parliamentary group (APPG) on domestic violence. In turn, a parliamentary briefing paper followed the hearing. Both papers included a number of recommendations for the Ministry of Justice, the senior family judiciary, and for statutory agencies involved in family law processes in relation to cases of domestic abuse in the family court.

6.24 Mr Justice Cobb was commissioned to carry out a review of the existing English Practice Direction (PD), ‘Child Arrangements and Contact Orders: Domestic Violence and Harm’, known as PD12J. Proposed changes to the existing PD12J included the following:

- Where the involvement of a parent in a child’s life would place the child or other parent at risk of suffering harmful abuse, the presumption should be displaced (this, of course, distinguishes the English position from Northern Ireland where no such presumption exists).
- There is a requirement for the court to ensure that the court process is not being used as a means in itself to perpetuate coercion, control or harassment by an abusive parent. Family court judges need to be alert to and deal robustly with a respondent who is uncooperative or obstructive in the litigation and/or in relation to the child arrangements themselves.
- It is proposed that courts should consider more carefully the waiting arrangements at court prior to the hearing, and arrangements for entering and exiting the court building. Women’s Aid reports that 55% of women respondents to its survey in 2015 who had been to the family courts had no access to any special measures, and 39% were physically abused by their former partner in the family court. The APPG report speaks of women commonly being followed, stalked, harassed and further traumatised after leaving court.

• Where domestic abuse has been proved, a court shall obtain a safety and risk assessment conducted by a specialist domestic abuse practitioner working for an appropriately accredited agency.

6.25 Recent authorities in England emphasised that it is wise for some express reference to be made at least to PD12J in the judgment or record of appropriate decisions.7

DISCUSSION
6.26 The statutory presumption does not exist in Northern Ireland as it does in England. The English PD12J was introduced to deal with a difficulty that the presumption had thrown up. To that extent, no such difficulty exists in Northern Ireland. Nonetheless, out of an abundance of caution, we recommend that consideration be given to introducing a direction in similar terms to PD12J on a stand-alone basis to ensure that courts are fully aware of the need to protect mothers (and, in rare instances, fathers) and children from risk of abuse in the contact arena.

Contact centres
CURRENT POSITION
6.27 There are 22 contact centres in Northern Ireland, with 15 main centres and seven satellite. Thirteen centres are funded by DoH, with funds channelled through health and social care trusts. Each centre is autonomous and is a member of both the Northern Ireland Network of Child Contact Centres and the National Association of Child Contact Centres, through which they are accredited.

6.28 The main channel of referral for users of the service is through the court system. Centres offer a range of sessions per week in line with their service level agreement with the relevant trust. Centres can host a varying number of families based on service requirements and resource availability.

6.29 In order to avoid the explosive dynamics of warring parents confronting each other at handovers, typical court orders are as follows:

Contact shall take place at … Child Contact Centre each Saturday morning from 10 am until 12 noon.

The Applicant father shall arrive at 10 am and shall leave at 12 noon.

The Respondent mother shall arrive with the child at 9.50 am and shall leave with the child at 12.10 pm.

On arrival at the Child Contact Centre, the Respondent mother shall leave the child in the care of the Centre Co-ordinator and shall leave the premises as soon as the child is settled.

The Centre Co-ordinator is requested to hand over the care of the child to the Applicant father as soon as the father arrives at the Centre.

At 12 noon, the Applicant father shall leave the child with the Centre Coordinator and leave the premises at once.

On the return of the Respondent mother to the centre at 12.10 pm the centre Coordinator shall hand over the care of the child to the mother.

The case shall be reviewed on … in the presence of the parties.

DISCUSSION

6.30 Human values are stressed in the contact centres. Relationships can be rekindled. The children are able to identify with and connect to both parents. The centres can deal with cases of implacable hostility and have an effect on children well into later life. In some contact centres, rooms are set aside for supervision by social workers if supervised contact has been the order of court. Otherwise, there is a simple monitoring system to ensure maintenance of a safe, neutral and secure environment for contact to take place. CCOs can attend sessions to observe contact as and when required. The rights of grandparents are now an established part of contact jurisprudence. When break-up occurs, there is always the danger that one set of grandparents will be estranged from the children. The role of grandparents in affording a sense of security and family connection for children must not be overlooked. Contact centres can provide a vital bridge for post-separation contact with grandparents.

6.31 The provision of information on the ultimate success of such contact is often a problem. The objective of contact centres is that they be used as a staging post rather than as an end. The recommended period for attendance is three months, although in some instances use of the centre can last much longer. If confidence and trust can be built, the object is to move contact into the community. The centres seek to help to promote parental responsibility by enabling parents to understand the value for the child in having contact with their absent parent and to build a bond of trust between the parents, resulting in contact occurring in the community. This is a key measure of success.

6.32 Whilst contact centres do not provide reports to courts or other statutory bodies on details of contact, other than in cases where there is perceived risk to the child, or to provide times and attendance at contact, the contact centre coordinator will from time to time liaise with the court children’s officers, providing basic feedback on how the process is continuing. To ensure neutrality and avoid coordinators being used in family disputes, it is essential that they are not expected to attend court or give evidence other than in exceptional circumstances.

6.33 Centres are neutral environments outside and independent of the court system. It is critical that referrers and parents understand that centres have no obligation to accept referrals where the referral presents a risk to other centre users, coordinators or volunteers. It is also essential that it is clearly understood that the order issued by the court applies to the parents and, whilst centres will facilitate the implementation of the order by providing supportive contact facilities, the order has no authority beyond that – that is, the centre still has the right to refuse the referral where the parents are unwilling to comply with the contact centre’s procedures.
Where a final order is issued, it often leads referrers and parents to incorrectly believing that the centre has no choice but to provide the facility for as long as they wish to remain.

6.34 A protocol should be drawn up to address the lack of understanding as to the precise role of contact centres by the parents and referrers whereby they think this is a final order. The courts should probably not be involved in this because contact centres need to be seen as truly independent of the courts and not an arm of the state. The protocol should make clear to the parents of the children and referrers the following matters:

- the purpose of the contact centre;
- the emphasis on this being a staging post rather than an end;
- the role of the court in this matter where appropriate;
- the independence of the contact centres from the courts;
- the need for referrers to advise centres of the existence of a final order;
- the role of final orders and the expectation as to how long the contact should typically remain in the centre;
- volunteers at the centre are not to be obliged to attend court to give evidence of what is being said and done;
- all parents will be asked to sign for receipt of such protocol; and
- a copy of the relevant court order will be sent to the relevant contact centre in all instances.

CURRENT POSITION

6.35 We are in the era of online communication. Our later chapter on paperless courts\(^8\) underlines this. Submissions of applications using an online template, which would ensure full information is submitted, would furnish the information to the court more quickly, albeit hard copy service might still be necessary where the respondent does not have online access.

6.36 Too much time and attendant expense is wasted at court hearings, with parents, legal representatives and witnesses waiting around interminably for their case to be called. Consideration should be given to individual and cluster appointments for first directions hearings, albeit experience with district judges has shown that, if the parties do not attend or are late, there is too much ‘downtime’, which is an unproductive use of court time. The Law Society suggested that this recommendation be trialled at a number of different court locations to ascertain whether individual appointments or cluster appointments work better. The Bar Council, again whilst welcoming this proposal, cautions that consultation/negotiation time and the availability of public transport, especially in rural areas, needs to be built into such a system, which would benefit from liaison with the family Bar, family solicitors, NIGALA and the directorate of legal services regarding the implementation of any trials. Typically, therefore, for rural travellers, coupled with instances where parties can attend only in the mornings due to child care difficulties, flexibility needs to be built into such a system. This might well be another instance where the Family Justice Board could coordinate guidance, which would be of assistance to the judiciary in developing this concept.

6.37 In order to ensure that cases are properly dealt with, there should be an obligation placed upon any district judge or lay magistrate to read all relevant papers in advance of court hearings. This is the minimum expectation on the part of the litigants themselves and the public generally. Where, for example, a judge as chair of the panel has not opened a file before one or other representative rises to move an application, there could be little confidence that case management precepts are being brought to bear in a credible and satisfactory manner. Given the huge volume of work that is processed in the Family Proceedings Court, judges and lay magistrates spend hours reading the papers in advance. This reflects an appreciation that this is specialist work requiring not only a sufficient grasp of the facts but reflection or study in respect of the legal authorities and consideration of case management issues.

6.38 Arrangements should be in place in all courts to make files available in advance of court hearings.

DISCUSSION

6.39 There is a need for a change of culture amongst parents, the general public, support services and legal representatives in relation to the public’s right to access court services. With rights come responsibilities. What is needed is reinforcement of exactly what is required of those wishing to access justice through the courts — that is, prompt attendance and adherence to court orders. Perhaps a public awareness campaign — cost of downtime and non-attendance as per DoH documentation on appointments not attended — would begin to focus the minds of those seeking to use services. One idea might be a series of leaflets posted in each family centre highlighting this in the same manner as leafleting of broken consultations appears in general practitioners’ surgeries. The appointment system could be piloted in Belfast and rolled out if proven effective.

6.40 There needs to be more efficient use of existing first directions hearings — for example, all parties must appear before the court for the judge to outline the obligation on the parties to work in the best interests of the children and for comprehensive directions to be handed down by the court with express time limits for compliance.

6.41 The use of the current Children Order Advisory Committee (COAC) private law case management guidelines must become more of an imperative than currently is the position. They are comprehensive but not widely used in many court areas. They outline six steps:

- Pre-proceedings correspondence, with an emphasis on alternative dispute (ADR) resolution. Our perception is that such correspondence, with an emphasis on alternative dispute resolution and the protocols, is not viewed as constituting a priority for a significant number of solicitors’ practices. This culture has to change.

- Commencement of proceedings using form C1, which should include comprehensive answers to all questions and attach pre-proceedings correspondence.

- First directions hearings to encourage ADR and identify issues to be determined. This is the essence of a problem-solving approach to family justice.

- Case management review to take place not more than 40 days after the first directions hearing and to timetable the case to hearing.

- Pre-hearing review.

6.42 We recognise that there are instances where these directions cannot be slavishly followed due to the flexible nature of cases. At times, there will be a need to encourage parties to work together in order to build confidence, trust and commitment between all concerned, perhaps before listing the case. Nonetheless, we are satisfied that, normally, adherence to these guidelines in a manner that is outcome-focused is the most productive way forward.

6.43 A strong argument exists for C1 and C1AA forms being required to be processed through an interactive online template in order to enhance stricter compliance as per the guide. It would not necessarily solve all problems, such as the omission of some or all previous proceedings from question 3 (very common). On the other hand, it would put an end to prolix and provocative responses to question 12 (reasons for application). Among other things, it would prompt inclusion of pre-proceedings correspondence and any relevant report, and it would even force the applicant to disclose a telephone contact number. Court staff are not qualified to vet paperwork. The embedded guidance notes in form C1 are frequently removed and full answers are not given. Properly/conscientiously answered form C1AAs are rare in practice. An interactive online programme would go a long way to addressing the problem.

6.44 There is also much to be said in pending proceedings for greater use by lawyers of C2 applications in the private law sector, in particular to address the situation where the parties have the case adjourned for two or three months to test a contact arrangement only to return after all that time to report a breakdown occurring at an early stage. Aggrieved parents need to ask the court more often than at present to list such cases sooner. It is natural to expect this request to be in writing.
and with reasons stated to enable the judge to make an informed decision administratively, and the panel can appreciate the background from their reading of papers in advance of the new date. That still means the issues have to be brought before the court, with the parents willing to attend, in order to begin addressing the issue. Much could be achieved if the issue was seen as a problem-solving concept and the court children’s officer or, perhaps preferably, the relevant social worker were available to visit the care parent and children to see whether the problem could be resolved informally, pending the scheduled court appearance.

6.45 An issue was raised in the course of the Review regarding the delivery of papers to district judges and lay magistrates in advance of the hearing. We agree that it is essential for judges to have sufficient time in advance of hearings to familiarise themselves with the papers, and this will require NICTS to bag up and deliver files in advance to an appropriate location. For full-time assigned judiciary, that would be a delivery to the judge’s own courthouse. For peripatetic judges and deputies, it would be a nominated courthouse.

Judicial inconsistency of approach

CURRENT POSITION

6.46 Unlike other jurisdictions, judicial continuity is not a problem in Northern Ireland. Great care is taken, where practicable, to ensure continuity. For example, the FPCs sit all year round and, subject to leave and illness, FPC judges ensure that, despite the number of cases involved, continuity is achieved. Similarly, in the FCCs and the High Court, the fewer number of cases makes it all the easier to ensure continuity. We emphasise, therefore, that this is not a problem that has been the source of criticism in our Review.

6.47 General inconsistency of approach across the entire bench, especially where at times deputies are dealing with cases, was raised with us and was the source of adverse comment. This lack of consistency also embraces differences in procedures — for example, in respect of the lodging of court applications.

DISCUSSION

6.48 A key component in resolving this problem is the issue of judicial training. As we will deal with in some more detail under the public law area, the essential — indeed the only — way to ensure a consistency of approach is by proper joint training and meeting of judges in the family justice system. In an area where family judges are currently at times isolated and, therefore, potentially out of touch with the developments unfolding in other courts, these issues need to be addressed.

6.49 The representative on our Reference Group from the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children and, indeed, those to whom we spoke at a meeting facilitated by the Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action were at pains to emphasise that training of the judiciary needs to be provided by experts in child protection, child development, domestic violence etc. Such training needs to be carefully monitored and kept up to date with regular refresher courses. In a briefing paper in October 2016, Women’s Aid proposed specialist training for all judges sitting in the family court in England and Wales on all aspects of domestic abuse, particularly to raise understanding of the dynamics of domestic abuse, coercive and controlling behaviour, the frequency and nature of post-separation abuse and the impact of domestic abuse on children on parenting and on the mother–child relationship.

6.50 Helpfully, the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Children and Young People (NICCY) drew our attention to the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child, general comment no. 5: general measures of implementation of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, at paragraph 53:

53. The Committee emphasizes States’ obligation to develop training and capacity-building for all those involved in the implementation process — government officials, parliamentarians and members of the judiciary — and for all those working with and for children …

Training needs to be systematic and ongoing — initial training and re-training. The purpose of training is to emphasize the status of the child as a holder of human rights, to increase knowledge and understanding of the Convention and to encourage active respect for all its provisions. The Committee expects to see the Convention reflected in professional training curricula, codes of conduct and educational curricula at all levels.

6.51 As mentioned elsewhere in this Report, family judiciary do take the issue of training extremely seriously. This year a two-day training course for all family judges and newly appointed judges was convened, and it included addresses from senior social workers, psychologists etc. Going forward, it is proposed that there will be a minimum of three half-day sessions per year involving a speaker on a specified topic, followed by discussion. This will include such topics as when and how to meet children, domestic violence etc. This programme has been approved and encouraged by the Lord Chief Justice.

6.52 The advent of a single family justice system will be another crucial component in ensuring consistency of approach. The vast majority of private law Children Order applications are made in the Family Proceedings Courts. If there is an introduction of a single-tier system, this emphasis will shift and these recommendations will apply across the tiers.

Enforcement

CURRENT POSITION

6.53 The concept of enforcement has long been a subject of concern and debate. Repeat applications as a result of breaches of orders are a recurring problem and suggest that the current system encourages parties to return to court rather than resolve issues through other methods. Often this is because the relationship between the parties is so fractured that dialogue between them to resolve anything is impossible. For many fathers especially — although for some mothers less usually — the problem of ensuring that a contact order is enforced raises a major difficulty. Although the statistics earlier set out in this chapter reveal that contact orders in favour of fathers are regularly successfully made, perhaps they do not reveal just how many of these relate to breaches of a contact order or how many applications by fathers are withdrawn through sheer frustration in the face of implacable hostility by the other party and the apparent ineffectiveness of the court in enforcing the orders. The court should not make orders that are ineffective. If the courts buckle every time their orders meet disobedience or defiance, such orders will be worthless. That would mean the rule of law being replaced by the law of the defiant.

9 Rights of Women raised its own concerns that there remains within the judiciary, at all levels, a low level of understanding of coercive control and the serious impact of coercive and controlling behaviour on mothers and children.

6.54 Experience reveals that the current process of contempt proceedings is both cumbersome and ineffective. Statistics show that between 2011 and 2014, there were only 22 defendants convicted at all of one charge relating to a breach of a children or family order. Solicitors seem to be reluctant to issue contempt proceedings because the penalties have proved ineffective and do not result in compliance with orders. Responses from groups such as the Belfast Solicitors’ Association expressed concern that the judiciary has seemed reluctant to impose prison sentences for contempt in such instances whereas others, such as NICCY, tendered the view that criminalising parents who breach contact orders cannot be in the best interests of the child in question.

DISCUSSION

6.55 The fact of the matter is that courts tend to be reluctant to imprison those who have breached, for example, contact orders because it means children being taken into care where, partly through parental intransigence, they refuse to go with the other partner and where the imprisoned parent becomes a martyr who uses the imprisonment as a further stick with which to beat the non-resident parent. Accordingly, we recognise that, whilst in a final analysis imprisonment for a short sharp period may not be ruled out, it does not provide a regular solution to the problem.

6.56 In a system where there is a single family justice process, it should be possible to fast-track such matters more quickly than currently is the case and they can be dealt with by, if necessary, a different judge who will rigorously enforce the orders made. This would be strengthened by the implementation of ‘stop contact’ notices, which require to be served before contact is stopped. Such stop notices may mean one of two things: first, that contact is about to be stopped unless certain conditions apply; secondly, that contact is to be stopped, in which event the reasons for stopping the contact should be contained in the note. Such a requirement, which should be firmly enforced, should be included in any penal notice.

6.57 To emphasise the importance of these orders, it is also felt that penal notices should be attached to them so that recalcitrant parties will be left in no doubt whatsoever of the dire consequences that will attend upon refusal to obey orders.
There was a difference of opinion in our deliberations as to the stage at which this penal notice should be attached; some thought to do so initially before defiance had been illustrated would be counterproductive. Moreover, if penal notices become commonplace, the impact as a deterrent might diminish and would involve the probable requirement of personal service in every instance. On the other hand, others opined that it was necessary to lay down a line in the sand from the outset. We believe that this is a matter that could be left to the discretion of the individual judge, depending on the facts of the case and on their feel for the circumstances of the instant matter. However, it is a consideration that should be addressed by the individual judge in every such instance.

6.58 Such a penal notice, for example, would spell out clearly that any party wishing to stop contact must apply to the court first unless there are genuine child welfare concerns and even then they must apply to redefine the order.

6.59 Courts are becoming more creative in overcoming the resistance to contact by one parent or other. Thus, conditional residence orders as well as transfer of residence is commonly invoked. Moreover, the powers of the court should, by legislation, be extended to impose community service orders and parental attendance orders, which, if breached, would likely, of course, result in imprisonment.

6.60 We observed that in various areas of the law — for example, drink-driving offences, speeding offences etc. — offenders are obliged to attend compulsory classes where videos and other aids are provided to illustrate the grave dangers of the offences. If the relevant department were to set up and establish a similar process illustrating the profound damage to children that can be caused by warring parents and deprivation of contact with the other — attendance at which would be compulsory — this would have the potential to transform attitudes. This — that is, a community service order combined with parenting education accompanied by the right investment to provide childcare to ensure that the care of children is not used to avoid penalties — could provide the kind of understanding that courts currently are failing to afford. Failure to attend such a class would, of course, constitute a contempt. Those who responded on this topic were generally in agreement with this new proposal whilst querying the cost implications and requesting research on a similar implementation in other jurisdictions. It is to be noted that the Children and Adoption Act 2006, s. 4, provides that, if the court is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that a person has failed to comply with a contact order, it may make an order (an enforcement order) imposing on the person an unpaid work requirement, with 12 In England, under the provision of s. 4 of the Children and Adoption Act 2006, unpaid work orders can be made by the court. We have contacted the Justice Statistics Analytical Services to obtain figures for enforcement orders under s. 4 of the 2006 Act. Figures are only kept for contact order enforcement applications rather than orders made because, apparently, there are very few actual enforcement orders made that are recorded. The Justice Statistics Analytical Services has helpfully provided us with the number of applications for unpaid work enforcement orders made to courts in England and Wales: there were 630 in 2015; and 631 in 2014. The figures for 2016 are not yet available.

the standard of proof on a person claiming to have had reasonable excuse failing to comply being on the balance of probabilities.

6.61 We note the recommendations in paragraph 15.50 of the Stutt Report,13 which illustrate some similar thinking.

Recommendations

ONE-STOP SHOPS
1. The introduction up of a one-stop shop process at first directions hearings before family courts. [FJ10]
2. The Department of Health and the Legal Services Agency (LSA) to combine to fund dedicated services, with set fees, enabling the court to make referrals to services such as the court children’s officer, mediation, and an anger management service, drug and alcohol testing, housing and debt problems, contact centres etc. [FJ11]
3. All family justice practitioners, judiciary and court officers be given training in what services are thus at the court’s disposal. [FJ12]
4. Wherever possible, representatives of such services to be available for court hearing days, either online or physically in court. [FJ13]
5. Such dedicated services to agree set fees for this work (in liaison with the LSA and the trusts) and consideration could be given to automatic legal aid or trust authority if the court so directs. [FJ14]
6. Steps to be taken to recognise the real value of CCOs and to ensure they are adequately resourced. [FJ15]

CONTACT BREAKDOWN
7. The introduction of a fast-track, priority-driven triage system for cases where contact has broken down. [FJ16]
8. The Legal Services Agency to introduce appropriate arrangements to facilitate this prioritisation. [FJ17]
9. Such applications to be available with an online template, albeit hard copy service might still be necessary where the respondent did not have online access. [FJ18]

CONTACT AND DOMESTIC VIOLENCE
10. The introduction of a practice direction in Northern Ireland similar to PD12J as amended in England and Wales. [FJ19]

CONTACT CENTRES
11. A protocol to be drawn up to address the lack of understanding as to the precise role of contact centres by the parents and referrers, whereby they think this is a final order. [FJ20]

STREAMLINING THE SYSTEM

12. Individual appointments, perhaps in clusters, for first directions hearings to be introduced for at least trial periods across the family justice system. [FJ21]

13. A practice direction emanating from the Senior Family Judge directing the implementation of the Children Order Advisory Committee guidelines, subject to the right of a judge to preclude or vary their use in an individual case. [FJ22]

14. The attention of the profession to be expressly drawn to the preferred use of the C2 system in pending applications. [FJ23]

15. NICIS should ensure that files in advance of hearings are delivered to the courthouses of the full-time assigned judiciary and for peripatetic judges and deputies to a nominated courthouse. [FJ24]

16. C1 and C1AA forms to be processed through an interactive online template in order to enhance stricter compliance with the COAC guidelines. [FJ25]

JUDICIAL CONSISTENCY

17. Training sessions, where family judges are expected to attend as a group, to be introduced by way of a formal and regular system. [FJ26]

18. In both private and family law, a tutor judge to be nominated to be responsible for ensuring that family judiciary are kept up to date with current literature dealing with developments in family law. [FJ27]

ENFORCEMENT

19. The implementation of ‘stop contact’ notices, which require to be served before contact is stopped. This should be included in any penal notice. [FJ28]

20. The invocation of penal notices in all relevant court orders subject to the discretion of the judge to postpone such a notice. [FJ29]

21. The creation by the relevant department, probably the Department of Justice, of relevant classes to which offenders compulsorily must attend in the event of breaches of orders. Failure to attend would constitute contempt of court, punishable by imprisonment. [FJ30]

22. The introduction of community service orders for offenders who breach family court orders similar to s. 4 and s. 5 of the Children and Adoption Act 2006. [FJ31]

23. An emphasis on swift, priority-driven references back to court when breaches are observed. [FJ32]

24. The inclusion of these recommendations in appropriate legislation at the earliest possible opportunity. [FJ33]
Resolutions outside court

Current position

7.1 Family obligations involve the most intimate aspects of a person’s life. For a court to compel a person to act in a particular way in one of the most private areas of their life requires the strongest justification. Most family obligations take place in private. That means that such an obligation is difficult to police. In essence, the problem is that parties resort to court application in the first instance to resolve problems without trying to resolve the matters outside the court process.

7.2 Yet the court process itself is not at present adequately resourced to invoke meaningfully and adequately a primary source of problem-solving outside court — namely, mediation. Even if there are effective ways of enforcing a court order, it may be that the legal system is not the best way of resolving the underlying issues.

7.3 Family justice requires a problem-solving approach that may be best served by resolution outside the court arena. Family therapy or mediation could perhaps be more effective in the long term. We take this opportunity to recognise the valuable contribution already made by services such as Family Mediation Northern Ireland (FMNI), Relate NI, contact centres, Parenting NI and the counselling and helpline services that already support families in stress and support the court system by accepting referrals in circumstances where they have a charitable status and insecure funding arrangements.

7.4 The need for a fundamental reassessment of this issue — court or alternative dispute resolution — is well illustrated by some Northern Ireland Family Proceedings Court (FPC) statistics. In 2013, almost 6,000 children were subject to contact and residency orders. In the same year, 42% of births in Northern Ireland were to unmarried parents. Divorce statistics, therefore, may not reflect current 21st-century family life. Some 4,100 children were affected by 2,403 divorces finalised in 2013 in Northern Ireland. Moreover, after five years of separation, UK figures indicate one third of fathers lose contact with their children. The United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child emphasises the child’s right to maintain a healthy relationship with both parents.

7.5 The Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service statistics for art. 8 contact orders in 2014 revealed that 8,443 children were affected by contact and residence orders. Of these, 3,383 were aged under four; 2,468 were aged between five and eight; 1,683 were aged between nine and 12; 819 were aged between 13 and 15; and 90 were aged between 16 and 18. Interestingly, the response from the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children (NSPCC) to our preliminary Review recorded ‘family relations problems encompassing parental divorce and separation are the number one area of concern for boys and girls who contacted the service with 38,231 contacts across the UK in 2015. This was the same for children from Northern Ireland where 4,159 counselling sessions involved family relationship problems’. The various worldwide jurisdictions to which we spoke record similar concerns.

7.6 Mediation is conventionally the classic medium for resolving family problems outside the court context. It should potentially be an early port of call for such cases. However, our experience is that mediation in its classic sense is not widely used in the family justice system. If we are to progress towards the concept of a problem-solving approach to family justice, this must be addressed.

7.7 Experience shows that some courts are directing mediation but a number of these cases will be unsuitable for a variety of reasons — for example, lack of commitment to the process or high conflict over a long period in the adversarial system. Contra indicators are capacity, addiction, domestic abuse, mental health or not wishing to engage. Where judges take the view that an attempted mediation must be proven before hearing will be considered, waiting lists are growing.

7.8 On the other hand, advantages of early referral to mediation are currently recognised and include:

- more parents benefiting from a process they would not otherwise have considered;
- more soft outcomes, together with mediated agreements;
- learned new means of communication post-relationship breakdown;
- a draft parenting plan that mops up all the minutiae of family life post-relationship breakdown (for example, schools, parenting arrangements, methods of communication, medical information, child surname, involvement of extended families, holiday arrangements, after-school activities, child’s diet, etc.);
- engaging in mediation may diffuse a potential drift into more conflict and stalemate; and
- mediators reporting that, when the emphasis is focused at all times on the future well-being and needs of the child and not the conflict between the adults, and if that focus can be maintained over three to four appointments, agreement is more likely in some if not all of the issues presented on the parental agenda.

7.9 In 2015, FMNI concluded that the current approach to mediation is inadequate because

- Only 11% of work was directed from the courts in 2015.
- There are not the resources to follow the progress of families, although evaluation forms about once a month are sent out after they complete their sessions. Cases cannot be tracked indefinitely to check if they go to court due to a breakdown of the mediated agreement.
• Court-referred cases are mostly legally aided and, therefore, pose a problem — that is, they wait months and in some instances years for payment. A major problem here is that there is not effective legislation to enable the Legal Services Agency (LSA) to make interim payments, and we recommend that this matter be dealt with by the relevant department as a matter of urgency.

• There is also an inadequacy of government investment to steer parents away from the court system. FMNI expressed the view that mediation in Northern Ireland is underfunded, underestimated and misunderstood, and that mediators are in general not afforded the respect from other professionals that is certainly due.

• The Health and Social Care Board contract covers only 150 families annually on average, based on all the parents attending to individual ‘intake’ appointments and four one-and-a-half-hour sessions, which is not always the case as, given the personal and particular needs of parents, this may be less or more to achieve a mediated agreement. In some cases, the process starts and stops, and parents may not be ready but may return later in the year.

• Given the figures for children being the subject of contact and residency orders, there is a dilemma: with limited funding being directed to the developing mediation services in Northern Ireland (unlike the rest of Europe) and making it more accessible, how can a percentage of these families be diverted from court?

• FMNI is a non-profit organisation and is the only independent mediator in the voluntary sector. It has a number of specialist mediators experienced in direct child consultation. All mediators are vetted and trained in working with children and vulnerable adults. There are, of course, other mediation providers — for example, the Bar mediation service, which provides a pool of independent practitioners regulated by the Bar Council and subject to the code of conduct for mediators. Those trained by Quest have additional training in child protection/safeguarding and the inclusion of children in the mediation process.

• There is limited public knowledge of such services and resistance by some solicitors’ practices to referring clients out.

Discussion

7.10 Free mediation information sessions can help by dispelling misconceptions about mediation as a process. It is quite distinct from counselling. When separated parents become aware of the empowerment element, this can be powerful in itself. They set the agenda, not the mediator. The entire process belongs to the parents, not the mediator. The responsibility lies with them to generate options, to think from their child’s perspective and perhaps even agree to the child spending time with a specialist mediator to feed into the decision-making.

7.11 It has to be recognised that solicitors routinely practise a form of mediation between the parties in Northern Ireland through pre-proceedings, correspondence and at court. However, arguably, lawyers do not deliver, and are not trained to deliver, this type of service. Lawyers are not mediators managing high emotion in the wider family context (child development, child consultation, parenting skills, etc.). Legal mediation — putting forth options and encouraging parties to agree — is very different from sitting with both parents and assisting them to draft a parenting plan based on the knowledge that the parents have of the child’s needs and of the wider extended family. They are two distinct professions with completely different training pathways and a continuous challenge of learning and gaining experience in almost opposite approaches. The conceptual difference between mediators and lawyers may have a highly significant effect on outcomes in the family context.

7.12 The LSA could, of course, apply a stricter test requiring proof of an attempt to negotiate a way forward before accepting an application for funding. But the danger here is that this may serve only to occasion further delay, particularly with unwilling parties, and such a system might be open to manipulation by one party deliberately attempting to delay progress. Compulsory mediation may also create its own problems. People compelled to mediate may become reluctant to engage productively.

Other jurisdictions

ENGLAND AND WALES

7.13 All litigants in England are now bound by s. 10 of the Children and Families Act 2014 to consider undertaking mediation before issuing any private law children or financial remedy cases. It is an absolute requirement for the party wishing to issue an application that they attend a mediation information and assessment meeting (MIAM), unless one of the MIAM exceptions applies. The MIAM exceptions are set out in Practice Direction 3A of the Family Procedure Rules 2010.¹

7.14 Legal aid is available to fund the MIAM and the first mediation session, even if only one party meets the eligibility criteria. Funding is available for both parties, regardless of whether the eligible or ineligible party attends first. It is possible that an individual will become eligible for legal aid funding at a later date than the service was provided by virtue of the other party attending the MIAM and qualifying for legal aid according to the means test. The UK Government see this as part of its encouragement to separating couples to resolve their disputes outside of the courts where mediation offers a faster, effective and more suitable route to resolution in many cases.

7.15 Even if the parties are not deemed to be appropriate for mediation before the issue of proceedings, the court will continue to review whether this would assist throughout the proceedings, and it is possible to adjourn to facilitate this (although, in practice, once proceedings are before the court, they are likely to stay there).

7.16 There is also a separated parents information programme, which has a statutory basis in the rules. The court often mandates that the parties shall attend the programme once the case is before it at an early stage. Her Honour Judge Newton, a family judge in Manchester, with whom we spoke, indicated that invocation of the programme works well in England.

7.17 Relate in England has been trialling an online family dispute resolution platform, which will give separating or separated couples the tools to work through their decisions around the breakdown of their relationship. Users can take advantage of a free ‘assess’ tool before registering to take the next step in formulating their agreement. The ‘assess’ section provides them with good information and referral points (for example, legal aid, reconciliation counselling or domestic abuse support).

7.18 Beyond registration, the tool is designed to ask carefully constructed questions of each partner, with a view to reaching a separation agreement in areas of communication, children, living arrangements, assets and finance. The questions are answered separately within the online tool and, when both parties have completed their questions, a draft agreement is shown to both.

7.19 At this stage, while the agreement has not been reached — for instance, on the ongoing education of children — negotiation can take place between the couple using online messaging functionality. The negotiations can take place over several weeks and, although communication is managed through the online tool, it does not prevent other kinds of communication between the separated partners.

7.20 Where no agreement is possible on a topic or situation, the individuals can click to ‘mediate’ and, once they have completed all sections, this will activate the user’s selection of a Relate mediator, who will contact the couple to set up online videoconferencing mediation sessions.

7.21 Users need to upload supporting documents and complete financial checklists to support the agreements that they have made. Users can take up the option of a neutral review by a lawyer/mediator who will check the whole agreement and support documents for completeness. At any point, users can access legal and financial experts for guidance on issues and how they are seen in the eyes of the law so that they can complete their agreements within the tool.

7.22 Payment points in the user journey were modelled. This included options and the packages that are aimed at reducing the overall cost of separation and divorce for couples, and ultimately keeping the need for fewer and cheaper court settlements.

2 Ss. 11A–11P of the Children Act 1989 inserted by the Children and Families Act 2014.
The climate in England, therefore, is of moving, where possible and feasible, to service delivery online and focus on ‘iteration … basing decisions as much as possible on observation not prediction’.

SCOTLAND

The Scottish model allows the court to refer to mediation and, as in this jurisdiction, identifies concerns about the availability and funding of providers. The Report of the Scottish Civil Courts Review does not recommend compulsory mediation, concluding that mediation is more likely to be successful if the parties want to engage. It recommends that the better approach is to have mediation easily accessible and funded as part of the court process.

We observe that the Stutt Report at chapter 17 addresses this matter and broadly follows the thinking in Scotland.

NEW ZEALAND

We spoke to Judge Laurence Ryan, Principal Family Court Judge in New Zealand, and Judge Peter Boshier, former Principal Family Court Judge of that distinguished court. They explained that they have a system of Parenting Through Separation (PTS), funded by the Ministry of Justice, which has been in operation since April 2014, originally operated on a voluntary basis prior to that date (see also appendix 4). It obliges parents of children intending to separate in any non-urgent application to attend free sessions conducted by a counsellor or psychologist over three evenings. The purpose of the mandatory meetings is to ensure that the full consequences of the effect on children of the process of separating is understood and that the parties learn to resolve their disputes without conflict, if possible, outside the court arena. The family is encouraged to keep children at the forefront when trying to resolve all issues, including where the children reside, ancillary relief and divorce etc. This is, therefore, an obligatory process before court proceedings are issued unless there are ‘escape routes’ where more urgent attention is needed, such as where there is a domestic violence background or abuse of children has occurred.

These steps are extremely well publicised, and the parties attend without their lawyers being present, albeit they may well be represented by lawyers who will have drawn this mandatory obligation to their attention.

Parties can also use a family dispute resolution (FDR) service, which is often recommended by the PTS. This is again enshrined in legislation. A trained mediator will try to help parents reach their own arrangements for their children. Parties may need to pay for this if they can afford it, and funding is available for those who are eligible for it. Eligible parents can also get counselling prior to FDR if the FDR provider believes it is necessary for further effective engagement. This is more formalised mediation conducted by mediators who have been accredited and approved by the Ministry of Justice.

7.29 An analysis of this FDR is to be carried out by the University of Otago, the Ministry of Justice and the Law Foundation in New Zealand. It will take a further two years to assess the project.

7.30 If parties cannot agree the way forward, they can apply to the family court for the case to be determined. In most cases, however, they will have had to have attempted both PTS and FDR first.

7.31 Judge Ryan was enthusiastic about the results of this process. Whilst it is enshrined in legislation, it has not yet been analysed or evaluated since it was made mandatory. However, there has been evaluation of the voluntary process, which existed prior to April 2014 and such was the success that the Government of New Zealand enshrined this into legislation. The Ministry of Justice in New Zealand carried out an evaluation of the voluntary nature of PTS in July 2009, out of which the following points arose:

- The evaluation used information both from overseas and from New Zealand programmes to assess the focus and content of the programme.

- It recorded: ‘In the United States most parent education programmes are mandatory for couples filing for divorce, separation, child custody and/or visitation. Evaluations of these programmes have shown them to be effective and some have described their mandatory nature as “mandating an opportunity”. Surveys of attending parents have found that they also believe that the programme should be mandatory (eg University of Vermont “Coping with Separation and Divorce Parenting” seminar, 2006).’

- It is also recorded that ‘mandated attendance has also been seen as a way of ensuring parents attend the course early in the separation process … benefits are greater for those who have recently separated, compared to those who have separated for some time’.

- Of those who attended, over 90% agreed with statements that the course helped them to understand how separation affects children and almost as many thought the course would help them to work out a parenting plan, help to reduce conflict with their ex-partner and help them to talk to their children.

- Uptake was very much reduced where the attendance was voluntary.

- At follow-up, it was found that there was a significant reduction in reported parental conflict, with significant increases in parents satisfied with childcare arrangements and knowledge of issues related to separation, and an increase in parents’ and children’s adjustment in relation to separation. There was also a reported improvement in children’s behaviour, explicable by a change in their parents’ perceptions of the behaviour rather than the behaviour itself. Having attended the course, parents were able to place their children’s behaviour in the context of that which is normal for children experiencing separation. Children’s day-to-day contact with parents increased and children were also having more contact with their extended family.
Almost all participants and informants in the evaluation agreed that there is a need for a parent education programme for separating parents.

7.32 If the matter cannot be resolved and a formal hearing is required, the parties will be able to have lawyers to represent their views.

7.33 A note of caution needs to be added. A recent assessment of the New Zealand model has served to illustrate that the absence of lawyers in the PTS or FDR stage has been counterproductive, and it remains our view that provision for the presence of legal advice, at least in the background, even at this stage, remains necessary if success is to be achieved.

AUSTRALIA

7.34 We also spoke to Chief Justice Diana Bryant and Justice Victoria Jane Bennett of the Family Court of Australia. They similarly employ the use of a mandatory family relations centre, which the parties must attend before the issuing of proceedings to discuss resolution of the issues. There is a certificate of attendance at such centres, without which proceedings cannot be filed. The Government set up 65 such centres across the entire country, and it is regarded as very successful in that it has reduced the number of cases in which parties found it necessary to file proceedings.

7.35 This concept of resolutions outside court finds further expression in Australia in an innovative strengths-based, safety-organised approach to child protection case work in the Signs of Safety project, which is now utilised in jurisdictions in the USA, Canada, the UK, Sweden, the Netherlands, New Zealand and Japan. The approach focuses on the question of how the workers build partnerships with parents and children in situations of suspected or substantiated child abuse and still deal rigorously with the maltreatment issues. The strengths-based and safety-based approach to child protection work is grounded in partnership and collaboration.6

USA

7.36 A further alternative is that operated in the USA. In California, the judicial branch of the courts’ self-help center website provides legal information and free or low-cost legal help in the area of divorce and separation. Whilst the site does not give legal advice, it provides legal information on a host of family-related topics — adoption, child custody, child support, divorce, domestic violence, eviction on housing, medication etc.7

Discussion

7.37 We considered the possibility of the English system, under s. 10 of the Children and Families Act 2014, binding litigants to consider undertaking mediation before issuing any private law children or financial remedy cases.

6 http://www.signsofsafety.net
7 http://www.courts.ca.gov/selfhelp.htm
7.38 Provided controls were in place so that a fee structure could be developed that did not simply increase the overall costs in instances where there was merely lip service to mediation, and the mediation was available only through quality-assured providers, this approach has its attractions.

7.39 Our own thinking is that compulsory mediation is not likely to succeed. In any event, grave concerns surfaced from FMNI about the availability of an appropriate infrastructure for compulsory mediation in light of the issues raised above by FMNI, including a paucity of providers, provision of reports and funding. The average cost for eight to 10 sessions of court-directed mediation is approximately £800. Who is to pay for this if it is compulsory?

7.40 However, an obligation to at least consider it, with the onus on professional advisers to explain it to the parties before issuing proceedings, could be a fair compromise. We note proposed legislation in the Republic of Ireland requiring solicitors and barristers to advise any person intending to commence legal proceedings to give consideration to using mediation as an alternative means of resolving disputes. Solicitors will be required to provide the client with information concerning mediation services together with an estimate of legal costs should they proceed with the litigation, including an estimate of costs if the client is unsuccessful in those proceedings.

7.41 However, we are more attracted by the Parenting Through Separation scheme that operates in private law for parents of children in New Zealand; a similar scheme applies in Australia.

7.42 We recognise that many litigants do require time to adapt to their new status of separation, and the move through the current process may give them that time to come to terms with the changes in their lives and the lives of their children. Nonetheless, early resolution processes can be useful, not only for those who have separated some years ago and have adjusted to their new circumstances but, more particularly, to those who are now about to embark upon a potentially treacherous path, which can at times be at the expense of children.

7.43 We considered concerns about mandatory processes. The New Zealand FDR experience reveals that a substantial number of parents refuse to engage, make appointments and then do not keep them or, alternatively, do not even pay. In that case, the mediator files a certificate that the mediation process has failed and the matter then proceeds to the court. However, for those who do engage, Judge Ryan indicates that 70% to 75% resolve their problems without access to the courts.

7.44 We believe that the relevant statistics on contact/residence orders made by the courts in Northern Ireland set out in paragraphs 7.4 and 7.5 above lend measurable weight to the introduction of such a system here. They support the view espoused by FMNI that, if there was the will to begin the work to change this culture by funding the services that can support, educate and assist parents to continue parenting post separation, many of the lengthy and costly court applications could be resolved without recourse to courts, with an enormous attendant saving of costs to the public purse. Parents would be empowered to take responsibility for the future well-being of their children.

7.45 We conclude with these comments. Undoubtedly, the family has become more diverse and complex over the last decades, with consequent changes to the nature of disputes brought to court, such as divorce, maintenance and contact. The adults in the family have to take responsibility and be supported in achieving the best outcome from a relationship breakdown. However, the courts must be ready to be engaged and take an active role, otherwise there may be a lack of willingness by the parties to agree or mediate a sensible agreement. Support mechanisms, mediation, court proceedings and negotiation must be complementary in aiding the parties to achieve resolution.

Responses

7.46 Without exception, all of those who responded on this matter agreed that mediation plays a vital role in the family justice system and should be delivered by suitably qualified and regulated mediators. With the exception of the Bar Council, everyone agreed that mediation or other educative systems such as those in New Zealand should preferably take place before formal proceedings are issued. The Bar was concerned that if there was an onus on professional advisers to explain mediation in all cases before the issuing of proceedings, this could amount to a tick-box exercise, which might inhibit parties seeing the potential value of mediation at a later point. Our view is that this is to ignore the essential benefit of ensuring that parties recognise at the earliest possible stage that problems may be best served by resolution outside the court arena and that this should be a prerequisite to the issuing of proceedings. Such an approach, of course, does not prevent mediation taking place at a later stage for those who wish to eventually engage in legal proceedings.

7.47 In particular, there was widespread approval for an earlier educative programme similar to that now operating in New Zealand and England. The only cautionary voice was that of the Bar, which, whilst having no issue with the provision of educative programmes, did not believe that it should be made mandatory since it would create a barrier and restrict access to the court when required in certain cases. Once again this neither reflects our own view nor the mainstream approach adopted by others who were satisfied that the concept of Parenting Through Separation is a vital cog in ensuring that parties recognise the huge advantage to family life that can be shared by resolution outside the court arena. A proper task, perhaps, for the new Family Justice Board would be to carefully consider the full form of the evaluation of the New Zealand project, which is soon to be carried out in that country as indicated in paragraph 7.29 above.

7.48 A very interesting response came from the Men and Boys Initiative featuring the proposals of an independent organisation, New Approaches to Contact (NATC):
Reflecting experience in the United States of America, particularly in Florida, NATC proposed a system under which:

(i) On issue of proceedings the parents are diverted into a non-court process involving (a) court-issued information, (b) parent education and (c) contact-focussed mandatory mediation.

(ii) Residual cases where agreement has not been reached re-enter the court system and are streamed into two categories: (a) non-serious cases admitting of rapid disposal and (b) serious cases which are given increased attention.

7.49 The engine driving this early intervention system is the issue of guidelines by the court. The basis is that the court informs possible litigants what the court is likely to order, which would then end cases before they begin. It puts in place what the court would tend to order after a long period of litigation. Hence, most parties need not litigate to discover what the outcome is likely to be since the court has intervened early to tell parents the likely order if they litigate. The end result is that there is a general clearance of trial disputes from the list and cases of genuine substance can then be litigated in the usual way, including the fast-tracking of domestic violence cases for an early ruling/fact-finding hearing.

7.50 Schemes such as this early intervention project, which is being pushed in England currently, are indicative of the wind of change that is coursing through the family justice system. The emphasis is on the reduction of cost, time and months of adversarial drama by early interventions with educative programmes. We still favour the Parenting Through Separation solution by virtue of the input of professional expertise outside the court arena before engaging in litigation, but it represents one of a number of schools of thought that drive the concept of resolutions outside court and early intervention.

7.51 The response from Family Group Conference (NI) was part of the conceptual shift to seeking solutions outside court wherever possible. That group listed the virtues of using family group conferences at an early stage of intervention, with families using a trained coordinator to listen to and work with children to ensure their voice is heard in the process outside the court.

7.52 Similarly, Parenting NI currently plays an important part in appropriate interventions at the earliest opportunity for families outside the court system.

7.53 Family Mediation Northern Ireland joined the momentum, demanding a problem-solving approach through resolutions outside court. Its response stated:

The Court Service, in most cases, serves to deal with single issues and leaves the high level of mutual hostility in its wake. This then extends in the family life, which ultimately results in children caught in a position of divided loyalties and subsequent long-term emotional turmoil. On the continuum of poorly managed parental separation, all government departments and other services will incur costs.
7.54 The response from Detail Data – a coalition of leading organisations including Family Mediation NI, the NSPCC, Barnardo’s NI, Familyworks NI, Parenting NI, the Northern Ireland Association of Social Workers, Detail Data and the Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action – similarly gives strong support to the fresh emphasis on solutions outside the court system. Its report records:

In Northern Ireland, when parents have an acrimonious separation, the primary route for resolution is through the courts. Over the last judicial three years in Northern Ireland, there have been more than 24,000 decisions impacting on thousands of children’s lives made by judges and 10,206 contact and residences orders issued over the last three judicial years.\(^8\) The average time taken to resolve a family law case is six months with 22 cases lasting around 16 months … Family Mediation offers an alternative to adversarial court proceedings that can help parents negotiate the profound changes their family is going through and reach an agreement that works for everybody. Reaching an agreement through the family mediation process can also lead to a better relationship between the couple following the separation.\(^9\)

7.55 The Northern Ireland Guardian Ad Litem Agency’s response on this topic stated:

Reference to resolution approaches outside court in other jurisdictions is to be welcomed. It is critical that information, supports and services are founded on the principle that parents have and retain responsibility for their children post-separation and are best placed to inform and involve them in plans and decisions affecting them. Initiatives such as attendance at Mediation Information and Assessment Meeting in the Children and Families Act 2014 and ‘parenting through separation’ in New Zealand merit consideration. The efficacy and sustainability of the range of educative/information and support services needs to be addressed.

7.56 The fact of the matter is that the public also have a strong appetite for this development. In its response Relate NI records that ‘in June 2015 a telephone survey indicated that people going through separation and divorce would have attended counselling had they known about the service delivered by Relate NI’.

Recommendations

1. Mediation or some similar system to be more widely available within the family justice system. [FJ34]

2. Mediation to be more easily accessible and funded by legal aid as part of the court process. Consideration should be given to introducing legislation similar to s. 10 of the Children and Families Act 2014, mandating the undertaking of mediation before issuing any private law children or financial remedy cases. [FJ35]

3. However, our preferred recommendation is for an earlier educative programme similar to that of the Parenting Through Separation or separated parents information programme in New Zealand and England respectively, where families are required to attend, save in exceptional circumstances, prior to issuing proceedings. Thus, mediation is seen as but one possible avenue to be explored, which may in the event be advised by the programme. [FJ36]

4. Mediators to have some experience in child protection and adult safeguarding. [FJ37]

5. Close liaison between the Department of Justice in Northern Ireland and the New Zealand family justice system would be the first step, for instance, on the legislative change that would be required to introduce a formalised programme along the lines now operating in New Zealand and elsewhere. [FJ38]

6. Certain cases should be exempt from immediate referral to a parenting programme, which would include:
   - where a party or their children have been subject to domestic violence;
   - where there are allegations of sexual abuse;
   - where there are allegations of drug or alcohol misuse;
   - if a party is unable to take part — for example, if they live outside the jurisdiction, are in custody or refused to take part;
   - where removal out of the jurisdiction of Northern Ireland appears imminent;
   - where a party is currently involved with social services because there are concerns about the safety or well-being of a child; and
   - if there is an existing order that has been breached. [FJ39]
Divorce proceedings in Northern Ireland

8.1 Cases involving divorce and ancillary relief differ from most other cases that come before the family court. These cases do not deal with a single incident episode where opposing protagonists who win or lose are unlikely to have future contact with or impact on each other. Instead, in divorce and ancillary relief cases, the parties’ lives are interconnected through relationships with children, family and friends. The challenge is to find the best method of resolution in the most cost-effective way, bearing in mind that the aim of this Review is primarily to consider the high human cost of the system rather than a financial one.

Current system

8.2 Under the present system, proceedings are issued by filing hard copy documentation in the court office. Forms are available to download from the Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service (NICTS) website, and there is guidance on filling in the forms and checklists available to be downloaded.

8.3 As with many of the websites currently in use, not only here but elsewhere, they are often based on fact sheets. Professor Roger Smith OBE, former director of JUSTICE, with whom we spoke, has said:

The best sites, like the Dutch one, are turning themselves around so they ask questions of the user and identify exactly what the user wants. Airline websites don’t give you a suite of timetables — they ask you where you want to go.

8.4 The party issues a petition for divorce (at least two years after the date of the marriage), judicial separation or nullity. In the prayer of the petition, the petitioner may claim ancillary relief, and thereafter a summons for ancillary relief issues. The summons (with supporting affidavit) for ancillary relief is normally issued after the decree nisi has been granted. The website currently in use is based on providing forms and advice checklists.

8.5 Consequently, proceedings are issued in hard copy over the counter or by post. There is a remarkable lack of technology invoked in the process.

8.6 Divorce proceedings are served personally or by post on every respondent or co-respondent.¹ Consequently, there is exclusive reliance on personal service or service by post. No provision is made for electronic service.

8.7 In undefended divorces, petitioners come to court, usually with a solicitor and barrister, and give sworn evidence before a judge, and the court decides whether or not to grant the divorce.

8.8 In defended divorces, petitioners and respondents come to court prepared to give oral evidence, with the usual adversarial system, and the court then adjudicates.

8.9 In divorces where there are children under the age of 18 years (16 if not in education or training), a statement of arrangements for children is filed and signed by each of the parties to the divorce. In 2014, 41% (930) of the divorce petitions received in the court office were as a result of two years’ separation with consent, similar to the 40% in 2013. There were 898 decrees nisi granted in the High Court during 2014, 454 of which were on the no-fault grounds of two years’ separation with consent or five years’ separation.

8.10 Delay is endemic in the system. The average time interval in 2014 between divorce petitions being issued and decrees being granted was 43 weeks. This is too long a time lapse between divorce petitions being issued and the decrees being granted.

Discussion

8.11 The necessity of a court hearing before a High Court judge or a county court judge in every divorce, even when there are no issues of contention between the parties, seems wasteful of time, money and resources. Parties can become focused on the grounds for divorce, seeking a fault ground in an effort to influence the ancillary relief proceedings.

8.12 A defended divorce can create bitterness and resentment, which is the worst possible environment for enabling the parties to achieve an agreed resolution in relation to their financial matters and can impact adversely on the children. Parties may try to use care or residence of the children to gain an advantage in ancillary relief.

8.13 Parties may also sometimes seek maintenance pending suit, which can continue for a substantial period if the decree nisi is defended. Apart from the financial costs, this can create resentment when the parties come to deal with ancillary relief. Similarly, the party who has not sought maintenance pending suit but has a much reduced income whilst proceedings go on for longer than expected also can nurse a sense of grievance, justified or otherwise.

8.14 We have already considered the notion of a pre-action protocol and the Parenting Through Separation programme and family dispute resolution service that operate in private law for parents of children in New Zealand in chapter 7. The concept is eminently suitable in the context of divorce, where children can be a casualty of the process.
Adjudication of divorces

APPLICATIONS ONLINE

Discussion

8.15 We are satisfied that there should be a website based on providing forms and advice checklists. The current website should be revisited to ensure that a site asks questions of the user, identifying what the user wants rather than providing merely a fact sheet. A question-and-answer approach should be considered.

8.16 The establishment of an online information hub to give information and support for couples to help them to resolve issues following divorce or separation outside court should be contemplated, in keeping with the Norgrove recommendations in England. We consider that NICTS should invest in and establish an online information hub, advice line and centre, which would be available remotely. And there would be a central information hub located in specified court buildings— in Laganside Courts in Belfast, for instance, which would be staffed by NICTS to assist service users.

8.17 We see no reason why there should not be a requirement that all divorce applications are made online, with identifiable triggers, which would permit a paper application (for instance, for a foreign marriage where no marriage certificate exists). In this context, a link with the General Register Office for Northern Ireland, which administers the registration of births, deaths and marriages, to guard against inauthentic certificates being filed online would be of value.

8.18 One aim must be to ensure the process is much cheaper and, therefore, more accessible than at present.²

8.19 For a fixed fee, a meeting with court staff could be provided to litigants in person and the completed forms checked in anticipation of readiness for issue.

8.20 Automated telephone responses for standard queries, including a response directing callers to the online information, would also be useful. This would potentially reduce unnecessary or unwarranted disruption to staff working in operations.

² However, we note with some measure of concern the comments of the President of the Family Division, the Right Honourable Sir James Munby, in England and Wales when addressing the Justice Committee in London in January 2016. It was reported he said that one of the first legal functions to go online was likely to be divorce:

‘It will not take people long to work out that the cost of administering an online system is but a fraction of the cost of organising the present paper-based system …

‘Online divorce—I am not propounding this merely because I am in charge of family justice; it would be my view whatever system I was in—is an obvious front-runner for that, because from the legal and administrative point of view divorce is a fairly straightforward process that can be very easily digitised. If the MOJ is able to produce an effective online divorce system, that will give enormous credibility to the wider vision of an online court. Conversely, if it cannot, we are in very great trouble.

‘I have been discussing online divorce—the need for it and the form of it—with officials for several months, and I am becoming increasingly concerned. My current position is that the ability to deliver is a question on which the jury is still out. The word I would use is disappointed. I am disappointed by where we have got to after many months of work. I still have no clear answer to such basic questions as what is the overall timeline, being realistic, and what are the stages in the process. It causes me very real concern, not just, or even primarily, because of its effect on online divorce, but in terms of its potential impact on the entire modernisation system.’
8.21 Crucially, NICTS would have to invest in the technology to enable the online issue of all divorce proceedings.

8.22 It would also require amendment of the Family Proceedings Rules (Northern Ireland) 1996 to allow for the online issue of all divorce proceedings.

8.23 Amendment of the Family Proceedings Rules (Northern Ireland) 1996 would also be necessary to permit electronic service. However, not all service users may have an email address and/or the petitioner may not know the email address. There is the additional problem of proving service by email. Although the petition may be sent by email, it does not necessarily follow that the email has been received and/or read by the recipient.

8.24 This problem of service can partly be met by amendment of the rules to allow for the acknowledgement of service to be filed online. This would meet the problem that arises with the increase in possibility for travel, where people tend to relocate, and effecting a service becomes more costly and expensive both in terms of time and money. A further refinement could be that, on occasions, an application can be made to deem service good or for substituted service, supported by a summons and affidavit, providing for emailing correspondence and confirming receipt of the divorce petition by email.

8.25 All that said, there would still have to remain the fallback situation of the current service conditions in the event that the email service was not acknowledged in any form, which would inevitably occur where the other party did not have an email address or the email address was incorrect etc. The situation would be resolved, presumable by an amendment of the Family Proceedings Rules, to permit electronic service whilst retaining the option of service by post.

THE HEARING

8.26 We note, as did the Stutt Report at paragraph 15.41, that ‘the court process itself [has] the potential to drive up costs or encourage adversarial behaviour, including the requirement in Northern Ireland for petitioners to attend court in person’.

8.27 We are also acutely conscious of the high importance in Northern Ireland attached to marriage and the significance of its dissolution. However, we are an increasingly diverse society, and one of our aims must be to remove the emotional and financial pain that attends upon such a process as constituted at present.

8.28 For some time now the courts, through the law, have adopted the concept of no-fault divorce, exclusively or as an option by way of alternative to traditional fault-grounded divorce. In short, the court examines the condition of the marriage rather than the question of whether either party is at fault. No-fault divorce was intended to and should have become a quick and inexpensive means of ending a marriage, especially when a couple has no children and moderate property assets. We concluded that such a conceptual change should evolve into an online, technologically friendly, less costly, more efficient and swifter process whilst always bearing in mind the need to keep any children to the fore of a couple’s thinking.

8.29 Accordingly, it is our view that divorces sought on the basis of two-year separation with consent or five-year separation without consent must be dealt with as online paper exercises without the need for a court attendance. The granting of the decree nisi ought still to be made by a judge or Master (‘the adjudicator’), albeit they will determine the matter on the papers before them, with the discretion to invoke an oral hearing if it is deemed appropriate in the public interest to do so (for example, where fraud is suspected).

8.30 Fault divorces — for instance, on grounds of adultery, desertion, unreasonable behaviour etc. — and nullity should be dealt with as paper exercises online if they are undefended, the grant of a decree again being determined by the adjudicator (that is, a judge or Master) on the papers.

8.31 We are not persuaded that we should fully adopt the system in New Zealand and Australia, where there is, of course, a strictly no-fault approach to divorce and all divorces are dealt with online. We do not consider that that is currently the way forward in Northern Ireland. Whilst, of course, the majority of divorces will be based on two-year or five-year separation or otherwise undefended, and fought divorces in the main seem a waste of costs, a source of emotional stress and to the detriment of productive achievement, nonetheless there are some instances where fault divorce — and, for that matter, contested divorces — are acceptable as part of the traditional oral hearing concept before a judge.

8.32 The classic example is where one party, usually but not inevitably female, has suffered years of domestic violence and abuse and wishes, perhaps for the first time, to exercise the right to a public hearing of what she has suffered. That is an instance where a judge, in their discretion, might well determine that a public hearing was entirely justified.

8.33 There may also be two possible circumstances, albeit rare, where it may be important for the court to adjudicate on the particulars in a divorce based on unreasonable behaviour. First, where one party has behaved so badly that, in considering ancillary relief under art. 27(2)(c) of the Matrimonial Causes (Northern Ireland) Order 1978, conduct is one of the factors to be considered by the court. Secondly, if the conduct — for example, excessive gambling — has caused significant financial hardship, it is a matter that should be taken into consideration when determining any financial division. Whilst, of course, these matters could be determined before the Master, hearing on a divorce case where one party wishes the evidence to be made public may be of assistance.

8.34 It should also be recognised that domestic and sexual violence and abuse should not be ignored, not least because the evidence shows that the behaviour is often repeated in subsequent relationships. The family justice system should give a consistent message and may risk undermining the work on those issues if, in certain contexts, such behaviour in a petition based on unreasonable behaviour is simply ignored. Moreover, we go further. We share the view expressed by the Women’s Aid Federation that the court’s intervention in such matters can become more meaningful by providing that, if there is a finding of violent behaviour, the court can recommend interventions to address that behaviour. We understand, of course, that there is a danger that, if we attach a financial consequence to certain behaviour, we risk incentivising people to cite such behaviour. If we are to focus on the concept of financial loss, we can envisage long arguments about who has been the more profligate and will only encourage couples to dwell on the past rather than look to how they can work together in the future. Courts can be relied on to actively discourage such attempts.

3 The recent refusal of the Court of Appeal in England to permit the parties to divorce in Owens v Owens [2017] EWCA Civ 182 has revived the debate in England and Wales.

8.35 Finally, but perhaps most importantly, the interests of children must not be overlooked in the process. The adjudicator must always have a discretion to insist on an oral hearing where the statement of arrangements (which would still be a necessity in all divorces where children under the age of 18 are present) caused them to consider an oral hearing to be in the children’s best interests. That is analogous to the current situation where, on a divorce hearing, the judge reads the statement of arrangements. The fact of the matter is that parents daily make decisions concerning children without the intervention of the court and, subject to what we say below, it is difficult to see why separating parents cannot also make such decisions. As happens currently, judges give very careful scrutiny to the arrangements for children. On occasions, thankfully rare, the judge may adjourn the proceedings until more suitable arrangements have been made.

8.36 Finally, art. 15 of The Family Law (Northern Ireland) Order 1993 provides for the amendment of art. 3(4) of the Matrimonial Causes (Northern Ireland) Order 1978 (oral testimony not required in certain divorce cases). However, that provision has never been commenced. Power to commence it rests with the Department of Finance. Technically, only a commencement order is required. However, it might be regarded as controversial, in which event Northern Ireland Executive approval would be needed.

Responses

8.37 With the exception of the Belfast Solicitors’ Association, which noted with regret the proposal that two-year and five-year separation divorces on fault-based grounds divorces should become online paper exercises, no other response objected to the simplification of the divorce process through the potential for administrative and online adjudication as outlined in our proposals.

8.38 Concern was raised, however, about the inclusion of divorce applications involving minor children in administrative and online adjudication. The Law Society, for example, considered it was not appropriate in cases concerning children under 18 in circumstances where the judge had a statutory function to fulfil and to approve the arrangement for those children. These are reasonable concerns in this context, but the proposals in this Review specifically retain the requirement that the judge will consider carefully the statement of arrangements. There will be the discretion retained to hold an oral hearing where the judge deems that in the best interests of the child to do so. Moreover, the statement of arrangements itself could be tightened up to ensure that both parties have commented on the statement of arrangements before an oral hearing would be granted. Failure to do so would be one of the key components of a decision by a judge to exercise his discretion to insist on an oral hearing. Moreover, if there were ongoing proceedings in relation to children of the family, this again might well be a basis for a judge exercising a discretion to insist on an oral hearing. Nonetheless, it has to be recognised that the vast majority of divorces involving parents that come before the courts provide suitable arrangements for the children. In a context where we suggest a format such as Parenting Through Separation, the courts will be in a position to be further satisfied that the parties have been thoroughly advised as to the need to keep children to the forefront of their thoughts in the unhappy circumstances of a divorce.

8.39 The Bar raised concerns about paragraph 8.19 concerning the fixed fee recommendation for a meeting with court staff to check forms in anticipation of readiness for use. The fact of the matter is that court staff already check petitions, which are often returned to practitioners and personal litigants because the petitions have been incorrectly included. Moreover, there is no legal aid for divorces and already the system of payment for services in the divorce context is an accepted norm. A modest fee for additional assistance if it is required does not seem an inordinate demand on the public, especially where there is already an online information hub providing information and support.

Recommendations

1. The responsible department to take steps to make the operation of the divorce process in Northern Ireland more administrative and less court–based, thereby reducing cost, time and, most importantly, emotional stress and strain. [FJ40]

2. Administrative and online adjudication of divorces in non-fault and undefended applications to be introduced. There is no reason why such adjudication cannot be processed online. [FJ41]

3. Administrative adjudication to be available for all divorce applications that are grounded upon two years’ separation with consent and five years’ separation without consent, subject to the hardship test. [FJ42]

4. Administrative/online adjudication to be used only in divorce applications grounded on one of the fault grounds — adultery, desertion, unreasonable behaviour — when the respondent/co-respondent has admitted the ground and does not wish to defend the application. [FJ43]

5. Administrative/online adjudication to include divorce applications in which there are minor children of the family. However, a statement of arrangements would still be required, and statements of arrangements should be signed and filed by each party and approved by the judge. That statement of arrangements should be signed and filed by each party before approval by the judge. [FJ44]

6. Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service to establish an online information hub, including a telephone helpline, providing information and support for couples following divorce or separation outside court. The information hub/advice line and centre would be located in specified court buildings staffed by NICTS to assist service users. [FJ45]

7. NICtS to invest in technology to enable the online issue of all such divorce proceedings. [FJ46]

8. Amendment of the Family Proceedings Rules (Northern Ireland) 1996 to allow for online issue of all divorce proceedings, electronic service and acknowledgement of service. [FJ47]

9. Online service to be supplemented by the option of service by post in circumstances where online service was not feasible or possible. [FJ48]

10. The adjudicator to be a member of the judiciary (a Master of the High Court or a family judge). [FJ49]

11. Commencement of art. 15 of The Family Law (Northern Ireland) Order 1993. [FJ50]

To these recommendations we add these fundamentally important riders:

- Firstly, in the case of children, the adjudicator would always have a discretion to insist on an oral hearing where the statement of arrangements for children, which would still be a necessity in all divorces where children under the age of 18 are present, caused them to consider an oral hearing to be in the children’s best interests.

- Secondly, contested divorces should still be accorded an oral hearing before a judge or Master.

- Thirdly, in the case of fault petitions, where one party wished to have an oral hearing, the adjudicator should retain the discretion to grant such an application in circumstances where they consider that it would be in the interests of justice to do so.

- Where for other good reason, in the interests of justice and at the discretion of the adjudicator, there should be an oral hearing, the adjudicator shall so order.

Ancillary relief

Current position

9.1 It is acknowledged that the current ancillary relief (AR) process is a much improved and streamlined process since the introduction of the financial dispute resolution (FDR) system (see below), albeit that this system applies only in the High Court and not in the county court jurisdiction. Consideration will be given to extending it to the county court jurisdiction although, with different district judges sitting in different jurisdictions or locations, it may not be such an easy fit. That may all change, of course, with the introduction of a single-tier system (see chapter 5). To remove any misunderstanding that may have arisen from this paragraph in the Review Group’s preliminary report, we make it clear that the current system, whereby most ancillary relief hearings are held in the High Court in front of the appropriate Master, with many fewer cases heard in the Family Care Centres (FCC) of county court judges, will, of course, continue. We recognise the immense experience of the Matrimonial Masters in the High Court and the esteem in which they are held by the profession. However, there are certain cases of ancillary relief that are currently listed before district judges/county court judges, and there is no reason why that also should not continue with a parallel FDR system.

9.2 It is also noteworthy that, with the appointment of a new Matrimonial Master in 2015, there has already been a reduction in the number of orders made and an increase in cases resolving at an earlier stage.

9.3 As for the actual hearings themselves, there were 1,178 matrimonial applications disposed of during 2014, of which 574 (49%) were for ancillary relief. The corresponding number of matrimonial applications disposed of in 2013 was 1,297, of which 543 (42%) were for ancillary relief.

9.4 In 2014, a judge heard only six of the ancillary relief applications and 568 were heard by the Master. It seems, therefore, that only the most complex cases are transferred to the judge. This should remain the situation.

9.5 The average time interval in 2014 between ancillary relief applications being issued and disposal was 55 weeks. For 43 weeks of that period, the ancillary relief was before the court (Judicial Statistics 2014\(^1\)). With the appointment of Master Sweeney, matters have improved. For cases received after 1 April 2015 (looking at the statistics for disposal timings for the period 1 October 2015 to 31 March 2016), the average time from receipt to disposal is 17 weeks. In relation to all ancillary relief cases, the average time is 71 weeks, which reflects historical delay with old cases and, hopefully, also indicates the improvements that have been made. The challenge will be to maintain the momentum.

9.6 Proceedings are issued by filing hard copy in the court office. Guidance is available to download from a Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service (NICTS) website, and that guidance is currently under reconsideration. Affidavit evidence is a cornerstone of the current system. The ancillary relief application is, therefore, supported by an affidavit of means and assets, which is responded to by an affidavit of the responding party’s means and assets. A separate summons and affidavit can be issued seeking maintenance pending suit, although the current thinking is that, with the increasing practice of issuing AR proceedings at the earliest opportunity, it will be the case that a combined single summons will be appropriate rather than two separate summonses.

9.7 Proceedings are served by post or in person.

9.8 The parties, or the legal representatives on their behalf, then attend a first directions hearing (FDH), when directions are made setting out the time for filing any further or outstanding affidavits, the time for the party to file outstanding discovery including valuations etc. Parties are also directed to make financial service enquiries, where appropriate, and time is given for the case to be listed for first review or, if possible, the case will be listed for FDR hearing.

9.9 Under guidance, parties are encouraged to endeavour to agree the estate agent to value a property and the accountant in relation to a business or a pension expert. Where agreement has not been possible, experts are encouraged to meet to try to reach agreement, reduce disagreement, identify the areas of dispute and keep an agreed minute of the meeting.

9.10 As soon as possible, a case will be listed for FDR hearing, which will proceed when such discovery has been provided to enable each party to file a statement of core issues. The statement of core issues ought to include each party’s proposal for resolution and reference to any offers made. In the event of a failure to resolve, an FDR hearing takes place, when the Master, in possession of all of the papers, assists the parties to achieve a resolution. The Master gives an indication on the papers and sets out his or her advice in a sealed envelope. If one party does not agree to resolve on the basis of the indication or otherwise, the case is referred for hearing before a different Master. In the event that a party does not improve on the indication at hearing, they may run the risk of being penalised in costs.

9.11 Applications for a Mareva injunction in relation to the disposal of assets are usually made to the judge, although such an application can be made to the Master under the avoidance of disposition/set aside provisions pursuant to art. 39 of the Matrimonial Causes (Northern Ireland) Order 1978. There have been a few concerns raised based on the premise that one party — usually the husband — can dissipate assets with impunity. However, the fact of the matter is that the dissipation or transfer of assets will normally be addressed by
• compensating the other party from remaining assets;
• setting aside the transfer;
• injunctive relief to preserve assets; or
• ongoing maintenance until the offending party makes good the loss, albeit this may impede the clean break principle that the innocent party may wish to invoke.

9.12 One discrete matter does currently concern us. This arises where, before issue of proceedings or early after issue of proceedings, a sale of property is lost because one party refuses to sell. Currently, there is no provision for a sale in isolation without hearing the whole case, which may have been delayed by issues of discovery.

9.13 In terms of enforcement of court orders, many cases return to court for enforcement on foot of a summons and affidavit for further directions pursuant to a court order being made or under the ‘liberty to apply’ provisions contained in the court order.

Discussion

MAINTENANCE PENDING SUIT

9.14 Parties sometimes seek maintenance pending suit, which can continue for a substantial period if the decree nisi is defended. Apart from the financial costs, this can create resentment when the parties come to deal with ancillary relief.

9.15 Similarly, the party who has not sought maintenance pending suit but has a much reduced income whilst proceedings go on for longer than expected also feels aggrieved.

9.16 One possibility would be to reverse the current process and address the ancillary relief/financial matters after the separation and before the decree nisi issues. Our understanding of the position in the Republic of Ireland is that the judge dealing with the divorce must declare that proper provision has been made and, therefore, AR/financial matters are dealt with prior to the grant of divorce.

PRE-PROCEEDING STEPS

9.17 Alternatively, a pre-action protocol could be devised. This would require the parties to attend an assessment for a mediation appointment before any proceedings are issued. The benefits of mediation would be explained at this appointment and the family would be encouraged to keep children at the forefront when trying to resolve all issues, including where the children reside, ancillary relief and divorce/judicial separation nullity. This would be along similar lines to the New Zealand principle of Parenting Through Separation. We note that Sir David Norgrove’s Family Justice Review: Final Report in England and Wales² recommended that people in dispute about money and property should be required to be assessed for mediation.

9.18 The appointment could be conducted by the district judge or Master or by an accredited mediator funded by NICTS. If the parties agreed, the matter could be referred on for mediation. Alternatively, it could be stated that the case is not suitable for mediation. At the very least, it would create the potential to bring the parties together to contemplate a plan to resolve all issues. We recognise that many litigants require time to adapt to their new status and the move through the current process may give them time to come to terms with the changes in their lives and the lives of their children. Nonetheless, an early resolution process could well be useful in terms of time, cost and final outcome in many cases.

9.19 Ideally, both parties would be represented. This is not a mediation process; it is a facility for pre-action resolution. Discovery would need to be exchanged in advance so that it can be an informed meeting. Both parties would need to be confident that all assets had been disclosed. It might not, therefore, be a suitable process for more complex cases, where expert evidence (in terms of accountants etc.) would need to be obtained or where there was an evident lack of cooperation in the discovery process.

9.20 Logistically, it could throw up problems. In what format is the raw material presented before the Master? This could be solved by the filing of a document similar to a court issues paper. Would the Master deal with all matters, including relating to children? Much would depend on what had been agreed between the parties in this regard.

9.21 Parties would also need to be given firm guidance on the resolution of ancillary relief issues pre-proceedings and the consequences of settling a case when a decree absolute is not on the horizon at that stage.

9.22 The introduction of a similar system to that in New Zealand, as refined by our own courts, would probably require legislative change similar to that enacted in that country.

CONCURRENT ISSUE

9.23 As a substitute for this, a practice has developed whereby a summons and affidavit seeking ancillary relief will issue at the same time as the divorce petition is issued, and efforts will be made to resolve the case up until or at the FDR hearing. Any agreement reached will be made an order of court after the decree nisi has issued.

EXISTING WEBSITE

9.24 As for the process for ancillary relief itself, the current website, which produces guidance and checklists, needs to be revisited (see paragraph 8.15) in this context to make it less of a fact sheet and more of a question-and-answer approach so that users can identify what they want.
9.25 Naturally, a balance needs to be struck between providing online assistance about the processes and making it clear that the court and the staff do not act in place of a lawyer, do not give legal advice, do not address matters that are ordinarily attended to by a legal adviser and do not engage in trial by correspondence. Nonetheless, the establishment of an efficient, user-friendly online information hub and centre to give information and support for couples to help them to resolve issues during the process is needed. Such an information centre would of necessity refer to the advisability of legal advice in considering appropriate settlement terms, especially where an issue requiring expert advice (such as actuarial advice on pension adjustment) surfaces.

ONLINE STEPS

9.26 There is clearly a need to employ and invest in technology to enable online issue of all applications for ancillary relief — for example, the Land Registry facilitates online applications. There is no reason why this cannot be done in the Family Division. As an incentive for practitioners utilising this service, the fees for online applications should be cheaper than those made by post, as in the case of the Land Registry. Considerable training was made available to practitioners to encourage them to utilise this service, and the same would apply to the Law Society in this case. Consideration might also be given to pre-recorded telephone replies to standard questions about procedures.

9.27 Similarly, payment for the lodgement of papers could be made using the solicitors’ ICOS (integrated court operations system) account, which is already in place.

9.28 Core issue documents now filed in hard copy could instead be filed and shared using an electronic mail system, which might enable a more timely receipt of the document.

9.29 Orders and corrected orders might also be issued online, provided there is a secure electronic mail system. Such a system should also provide access to the barristers involved in order to check such orders.

9.30 All of this would require amendment of the Family Proceedings Rules (Northern Ireland) 1996 (FPR) to allow for online issue of ancillary and relief proceedings. Once again, the NICTS would have to promote the use of the online information hub and centre to assist service users.

ONLINE SERVICE

9.31 Technology should also be invoked in the question of service. There is no need for exclusive reliance, as is currently the case, on personal service or service by post. There should be an amendment to the court rules to permit service by email. We recognise that service of proceedings electronically could present difficulties given the confidential nature of the application itself. The respondent’s email address may be defunct, not checked, accessed by third parties or be subject to corruption. Careful consideration would need to be given to this. However, it would be particularly helpful if the other involved parties were already represented by a solicitor, in which case there is usually no issue regarding service. The facility for electronic service, whilst retaining the option of service by post, should be introduced. There could also be a requirement that a respondent who had been served with ancillary relief proceedings by post would file an affidavit online within a specified time frame. The rules would have to be amended to provide for proof of electronic service.

ONLINE ISSUE

9.32 We also consider that the NICTS should invest in technology to enable the online issue of all ancillary relief proceedings. This would require amendment of the court rules to allow for the online issue of ancillary proceedings. A more complicated issue arises in considering the establishment of a streamlined system for simple and standard cases. The suggestion of a pre-proceedings meeting or assessment for mediation would go a long way to resolving simple standard cases and reduce the delay. However, we do not support compulsory mediation in ancillary relief cases. This is in keeping with the conclusion reached by the Report of the Scottish Civil Courts Review.³

AFFIDAVIT OF MEANS AND ASSETS

Maintenance pending suit

9.33 However, once the proceedings are issued, consideration has to be given to the fact that ancillary relief applications are supported by an affidavit of means and assets supported by an affidavit of the responding party’s means and assets. A separate summons and affidavit can, of course, be issued seeking maintenance pending suit, although we encourage the current trend to issue maintenance pending suit and AR proceedings in one summons where sufficient material is available. The parties or their legal representatives attend a first directions hearing when directions are made setting out the time for filing any further or outstanding affidavits, and for the parties to file outstanding discovery including valuations etc.

9.34 The maintenance pending suit application can be subject to abuse in that it can be used to seek maintenance when there is no interim hardship and there are sufficient assets to provide for both parties. Although there is provision for maintenance pending suit cases to be determined following oral submissions, a practice has developed where there have been affidavits and discovery requests in a separate hearing, which, in effect, can represent a duplication of the process and, rather than alleviate hardship, can increase acrimony.

9.35 At this stage, some applications travel in hope rather than contemplating from the outset the actual assets and income in dispute. Some affidavits contain matters and allegations that are unhelpful and irrelevant. This can result in an already injured or embittered party having an unrealistic expectation. Training for the professions and the judiciary on the existing guidance and the need to regulate content of affidavits would be helpful to obviate the current abuses.

9.36 It is our experience that cases are listed for FDR hearing before they are ready. Often, this will be a consequence of trying to work towards an early FDR date, which, of course, is to be welcomed in order to reduce delay, but if the FDR date is not used, it can mean that an opportunity for FDR is wasted.

9.37 Moreover, applications for injunctions are often made to the judge in relation to cases being dealt with by the Master. We consider that strong consideration should be given to increasing the power of Masters and district judges to grant injunctions in order to streamline the process and reduce delay.

9.38 It seems to us that, where possible, parties should be encouraged to address any interim hardship issues to enable a potential maintenance pending suit application to be considered alongside the ancillary relief application itself. Maintenance pending suits should be adjudicated upon following submissions and oral evidence should be heard only at that stage if deemed necessary by the Master.

Ancillary relief affidavit

9.39 A practice direction should issue indicating that the ancillary relief grounding affidavit should be filed within an accompanying A4 page that gives the following ‘at a glance’ detail:

- the length of the marriage;
- the length of the separation;
- the ages of any children;
- any other dependants;
- the ages of the parties;
- whether any of the parties or the children have a disability;
- any previous court orders;
- the occupations of the parties and last known income, where appropriate;
- the principal assets;
- the nature of any assets required to be valued by independent experts;
- the nature of estimated attendant borrowings;
- the area of expertise of any expert who might be required;
- whether there are any pensions and the likelihood of a pension report being required from an actuary;
- if any agreement has been sought/reached in relation to valuers/experts/valuations;
- whether there are any ‘special’ considerations;
- issues that are anticipated as likely to require some time; and
- issues that are likely to require further clarification.
9.40 Such a template, if it becomes the norm, will result in a more effective timetabling of the case and give focus to the application. The responding affidavit should, of course, be accompanied by a similar form.

TIMETABLING AND SANCTIONS

9.41 We should abandon the conventional approach of unquestioning tolerance of breach of timetables set by the court, especially in the case of disclosure. Such disclosure timetables should be enforced by a greater use of cost penalties albeit, of course, there should be flexibility for good reason. We strongly recommend a stricter adherence to timetables, the breach of which is a substantial cause of delay.

RESERVE LISTS

9.42 Reserve lists for FDR should be introduced. Lists of cases operate in every other division. Core issues are directed to be filed at least one week in advance. In practice, they are often filed closer to the FDR date itself. This is another area where unquestioning tolerance should be abandoned. If a standby FDR system was introduced, where core issue statements were not filed seven days in advance, they could be overtaken by a standby case where core issues had been filed seven days in advance. This would mean that FDR hearing time allocations are not squandered.

9.43 At present, where core issues cannot be filed in a timely manner as an important piece of discovery is not available until the FDR hearing date, parties are encouraged to attend court to negotiate, with the assistance of the court where appropriate, and the system operates with some success. It is proposed that this system should be continued.

Online technology for applications

9.44 The use of online technology to allow for the filing of applications, questionnaires, statements of core issues and agreed adjournment applications should be implemented.

Discovery

9.45 A more difficult issue arises in relation to all discoverable documentation. Currently, this has to be disclosed in hard copy. The argument is that, given its sensitive nature and the fact of the practical benefits of easy access to a hard copy, which is not usually so voluminous as to represent a saving by filing online, the current situation should remain unaltered in this regard only.

9.46 However, with the increasing importance of security in online applications and documentation, we recommend that use of online discovery should be explored, with the appropriate server, to guarantee that there can be security of such documentation and, if so, we see no reason why there should not be another step towards the paperless court concept.
Adjudication of ancillary relief applications

9.47 The system of reviews culminating in a hearing before the Master carries out FDR is an integral part of that system. It embraces a procedure for transfer to the judge in certain circumstances with the right of appeal from the Master.

9.48 Ancillary relief is a complex and specialist area of private family law that requires knowledge and application of statute and case law and full disclosure of income and assets by the parties. A standardised one-size-fits-all approach is not appropriate. Affidavit evidence should be preserved to ensure that the solemnity and gravity of what is being revealed is maintained.

9.49 Naturally, we do not close our mind to the possibility of online dispute resolution along the lines of the Rechtwijzer system (see paragraph 4.5), where parties opt to demand this on consent. Indeed, to date the system has processed 900 cases, of which 300 have been successfully completed. However, the danger is that, in a complex area such as this, a little knowledge can be a dangerous thing, and there is concern that one party or other will be misled through ignorance or otherwise into an incautious and binding arrangement.

9.50 We consider that the Rechtwijzer system with online dispute resolution in ancillary relief cases has been in being for perhaps too short a time to allow yet for full analysis and assessment. It may prove a breakthrough but we consider it is something that should be reviewed with the passage of time by, for example, the Family Justice Board\(^4\) when a more reasoned analysis can be made by those in Northern Ireland. At the moment, we err on the side of caution and take the view that the oral hearing of ancillary relief applications should continue.

Valuations in ancillary relief

9.51 Currently, guidance from the Master encourages joint valuations. In most cases, joint valuers are instructed. Practitioners will know that often in cases where separate valuers are appointed, different valuations (sometimes depending on which party seeks to retain a particular property) simply add another layer of costs. Valuers will be then encouraged to meet to try to address their differences and, as a last resort, a valuation hearing will take place.

9.52 In those cases, it may be useful for the Master or judge to have power to refer the matter to the Lands Tribunal, particularly in higher value cases where the Lands Tribunal’s experience and expertise can be utilised.

9.53 Such a referral may potentially cause a delay in the resolution of the case and dilute the benefit in having the entire case before the one ancillary relief court. On the other hand, valuations can be extremely complex issues for the uninitiated and, once the valuation matter is resolved, the court can quickly move on to clarify which outstanding matters require resolution. For that reason, we consider that the power of referral, to be used sparingly, should be introduced.

Responses

9.54 Since this chapter was largely drafted by Master Sweeney (High Court Matrimonial), it is unsurprising that the contents have met with almost universal approval. Some concerns were registered as follows:

- The professions advance some caution about the proposal in paragraph 9.12 about the sale of property at any point during the proceedings. They correctly indicated that it would be important but before any such decision was taken the court needed to be certain that it was in possession of a sufficiently overall view of the issues and that the same judge/Master who determined this aspect should continue to determine all matters in the case. Reasons for such an early order should be clearly set out with a prompt appeal mechanism. This would be particularly relevant in a case where, for example, one party wished to remain in the property along with the children under the age of 18 and did not wish to have a sale forced upon them.

- The Belfast Solicitors’ Association suggested that the proposal of ancillary relief and financial matters being addressed before the decree nisi is counter-intuitive since financial claims are ancillary to the divorce in circumstances where the court has accepted that the marriage has broken down. How can this be done when the marriage is deemed to be broken down only where the court grants a decree nisi? The reality of the situation of course is, as the Law Society response pointed out, that this is already being increasingly done and, in practice, maintenance pending suit cases are heard and dealt with alongside ancillary relief applications. This is no more than a recognition of the current reality with an encouragement that it be done more often.

- The professions questioned the benefit of recommendation FJ68 exhorting the referral of valuation matters to the Lands Tribunal essentially on the basis that currently there is no evidence that the Matrimonial Masters and district judges are not ruling on valuations in a fair manner and it would constitute a further layer of litigation that could provide additional expense. This perhaps fails to recognise that this recommendation has the imprimatur of the High Court Master for matrimonial matters, who clearly is of the view that it would be of value to her in carrying out her tasks. She clearly recognises what is a self-evident truth: valuations often involve complex issues that are best reserved to the acknowledged expert in this field — namely, the Lands Tribunal. Once again this is an operation that could be carried out on paper as well as by way of oral submissions.

- On the question of penal notices being attached to orders, the Bar Council again raised the concern that, if this becomes the norm, it may lose its impact. A recommendation, of course, does not mean that it will be imposed in every case because as recommendation FJ65 makes clear, such orders are within the discretion of the Master or judge where they deem it unnecessary or inappropriate. However, the Bar does make a value objection that courts should be extremely careful in including penal notices with all the attendant consequence on unrepresented third parties in ancillary relief proceedings.
9.55 We engaged in some substantial discussion with the representatives of the Family Bar Association on the question of the pre-proceedings steps set out at paragraph 9.17 requiring the parties to attend an assessment for a mediation appointment before any proceedings are issued. It is important to emphasise that this is neither a mediation nor an early neutral evaluation. It, of course, may lead to either or both but, in the first instance, it ties in with the general philosophy coursing through this Report that parties should not rush into litigation before having an authoritative discussion on the consequences of what they are doing with the encouragement to keep children at the forefront and trying to resolve all issues. This is but one part of the jigsaw in the new cultural thinking that we hope to introduce. Far from being an unnecessary additional layer, it constitutes a real opportunity to lead to meaningful and peaceful resolution without all the tensions, angst and expense of protracted adversarial litigation.

Recommendations

1. A practice direction making available a mechanism for parties to attend with legal representatives, or alone if unrepresented, before the Master before proceedings have been issued. [FJ51]

2. Online filing of questionnaires, statements of core issues, adjournment applications, skeleton arguments and, provided proper assurance about security is obtained, discoverable documentation. [FJ52]

3. All applications for ancillary relief to be made online. [FJ53]

4. Payment for lodgement of papers using solicitors’ ICOS account. [FJ54]

5. Orders/amended orders issued online. [FJ55]

6. Service of documents to be permitted by email as an option. The option of service by post should remain. [FJ56]

7. Option of serving affidavit evidence online. [FJ57]

8. Amendment of the Family Proceedings Rules (Northern Ireland) 1996 to allow for such online steps. [FJ58]

9. A system whereby the parties should be encouraged to address interim hardship issues for maintenance pending suit alongside the ancillary relief application. [FJ59]

10. Maintenance pending suit applications to be adjudicated following written submissions. Oral evidence to be heard only at that stage if deemed necessary by the district judge or Master. [FJ60]

11. Legislation to be introduced to empower the court to provide for a sale of property in isolation at any stage of the proceedings without hearing the whole case. [FJ61]

12. Affidavits in ancillary relief to follow the format set out in paragraph 9.39. [FJ62]
13. Directions and timetabling, especially in relation to discovery, to be enforced by a greater use of cost penalties. [FJ63]

14. The implementation of reserve lists for financial dispute resolution. [FJ64]

15. Penal notices to be attached to court orders (save where the judge or Master deems it unnecessary or inappropriate) with the specified provision of clearer consequences, including costs, interest, immediate property sale, transfer of assets and access to/injunction of bank accounts to secure implementation and immediate referral to the judge to address the issue of contempt. This provision could also serve to invoke rule 2.64(5) of the FPR ordering discovery and information from third parties and, therefore, a warning to such third parties may also be included. [FJ65]

16. A protocol requiring the offending parties to notify the other as soon as they are aware that they will be unable to perfect the court order. [FJ66]

17. The oral hearing of ancillary relief applications to continue pending further consideration of the Rechtwijzer system. [FJ67]

18. The power of referral of valuation matters to the Lands Tribunal. [FJ68]

19. In the arena of ancillary relief, early neutral evaluation (or FDR) should be encouraged by the professions. It would lead to a different Master hearing the case if the matter were not to resolve. Minutiae such as what documentation or raw material would be available for such early evaluation (for example, a statement of core issues) would also have to be contemplated. [FJ69]

Public law system

Current position
10.1 In Northern Ireland, responsibility for the well-being and care of looked-after children and young people is vested in the Department of Health (DoH), which delegates this responsibility to the Health and Social Care Board (HSCB). The HSCB in turn delegates this responsibility to the five health and social care (HSC) trusts.

10.2 Under art. 50 of The Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995, a child can be placed in the care of the state if a court concludes that the child is suffering or likely to suffer ‘significant harm’ as a result of the ‘care given to the child … not being what it would be reasonable to expect a parent to give’ or the child being ‘beyond parental control’. Compulsory measures of care or supervision lead to the state assuming parental responsibility for the child through the local trust.

Current statistics for children in care
10.3 The majority of children requiring alternative care are accommodated by family members or foster carers. Of the 2,875 children in care on 31 March 2015, 76% were in foster care, 41% in kinship foster care with relatives or friends and 35% in non-kinship foster care. The proportion in residential care was just 7%. On 30 June 2015, Northern Ireland had 49 residential children’s homes: 41 were statutory (that is, managed by the five trusts), with eight owned and managed by the independent sector. Some residential children’s homes provide short-term care, some deliver long-term care, some provide specialist care for young people needing intensive support, while others offer respite care to children with disabilities. One is registered to provide secure accommodation.1

10.4 Twelve per cent of children were placed with a parent and 5% in an ‘other’ type of placement.2 ‘Other’ placements have been described as including independent living, the Juvenile Justice Centre, an assessment centre, a community placement or a boarding school.3

10.5 Almost 2,500 children were in care in Northern Ireland in 2003. Eleven per cent of children in care in Northern Ireland achieved five GCSEs compared with 59% of all children in 2003. Over 50% of care leavers left school with no educational qualifications compared with 5% for all schoolchildren. A high proportion of children in care have diagnosable mental health conditions or disorders. More recent figures contained in Children in Care in Northern Ireland, 2013–14 reveal that 29% of looked-after children achieved five GCSEs compared with 82% of all children in Northern Ireland in the same year.

10.6 Fewer than 1% of all children in England are in care, but looked-after children make up 33% of boys and 61% of girls in custody.

10.7 Former Prime Minister David Cameron recently reported that one in four prisoners has been in care, along with a shocking 70% of Britain’s sex workers, and one third even become homeless in the two years immediately after they leave care.

10.8 The costs of foster care alone for children in Northern Ireland are extremely high. The Fostering Network states:

All foster carers receive a weekly fostering allowance which is designed to cover the cost of caring for a fostered child. This includes food, clothes, toiletries, travel and all other expenses incurred in looking after a fostered child. Fee payments may be made on top of allowances to recognise a foster carer’s time, skills and experience. While all foster carers receive an allowance, there is no requirement for fee payments to be made.

Allowances are set at local level and vary widely across the UK, and according to the age and needs of a child, but in England, Northern Ireland and Wales, foster carers should receive at least the national recommended rates.

10.9 These allowances include provision for food (including school meals), household costs (heating, electricity, general wear and tear), clothing and footwear, pocket money and travel costs. These figures are subject to change. Foster/kinship carers are free to spend the allowance on food, household and travel expenses as they feel benefit the child most. In addition, carers receive additional payments for other essential items for birthdays and Christmas.

10.10 In addition, there is an array of additional costs for children in care including the costs of health conditions, high welfare benefits instead of income tax from employment etc.

10.11 We have not yet been able to ascertain the cost of care in Northern Ireland and whilst we have costs of care for children in England, following a report from the National Audit Office and the Department of Education on 27 November 2014, we recognise that the costs in England may be very different from those in Northern Ireland. Nonetheless, the scale of the costs is indicative of the need to venture down other avenues to avoid, where possible, children being taken into care.

10.12 There must be a better way to deal with children. There were 68,110 children in care in March 2013 in England and Wales, with £2.5 billion spent supporting children in foster and residential care. Sixty-two per cent of those children in care were there because of abuse and neglect. The cost of fostering services for 2012–13 was £1.5 billion and the cost of residential care for the same period was £1 billion. The average annual spend on a foster place for a child was £29,000/£33,000, and £131,000/£135,000 on average was spent on a residential place for a child.

10.13 This emphasises the need to look at alternative means of attempting to ensure that children can remain with their natural families and receive specialised help to do so. Careful analysis of possible court models need to be conducted. There should be an element of cherry-picking to benefit from the experience of the English courts and fit it within our system.

10.14 Elsewhere, the final report in 2015 of the Child Care Law Reporting Project in the Republic of Ireland, which analysed over 12,000 cases, found that over a quarter of all families in care proceedings involved an immigrant parent, that mental health and cognitive disabilities are common among parents involved in such cases, and that one in three children in care cases had special needs.

10.15 Whilst we recognise — and, indeed, salute — the tireless commitment and utter professionalism of those engaged in the care system, we accept the criticism visited on this Review in the response of the Northern Ireland Social Care Council, which said: ‘The review misses the opportunity to acknowledge that in some instances care as an option may be unavoidable and can produce positive outcomes.’ It goes on to cite recent research\(^7\) where the findings were generally positive in terms of the children’s attachments and their self-concept. The children in care in the study were in ‘stable’ care. Most had been with their carers since very early childhood. Placement longevity, and the depth and quality of relationship with parents and carers, were critical in determining the children’s positive profiles. We readily acknowledge that, whilst it is outside the remit of this Review, steps should be taken to ensure that appropriate supports are provided to cement the continuation of long-term placements of whatever type.

10.16 That said, the troubling figures that we have set out in the earlier paragraphs in this chapter reveal some deep-set problems of children in care, which are not materially abating with the passage of time. They demand that we review in depth the system that places children in care.

Current process

10.17 A key problem in the current legal process is that the judge, particularly at Family Proceedings Court (FPC) level, often does not have sufficient information and/or the time to read and prepare the case to ensure an effective first directions hearing, which involves the identification of issues, evidence and options.

10.18 Often counsel receive instructions a very short time before the first directions hearings, which means that there is insufficient time for effective preparation. This may not be due to the legal aid system, where the chief executive of the Legal Services Agency (LSA) informs us that 95% of cases are processed and granted within three days and 99% within eight days of the applications.

10.19 Court lists do not permit effective case management because there is insufficient time to allow the judge to be fully engaged in the process.

10.20 Currently, the court is asked to determine all issues of disagreement in the course of proceedings. This leads to multiple hearings in the course of one case, which in turn increases the length of proceedings and adds to the cost to the public purse.

10.21 As we noted in chapter 5, the current transfer system from FPC and the Family Care Centre (FCC) to higher courts causes delay in progressing cases. Whilst it was envisaged that allocation to the appropriate tier would be based on complexity or public interest considerations, factors such as judicial resources and workload are often determinative of the issue. Decisions on allocation are inconsistent and cases are often transferred many months after proceedings have commenced. This causes delay, as the new judge cannot effectively progress the case until he or she has considered all of the material, which by that stage is often voluminous.

10.22 The present legal aid arrangements can lead to a situation where an inappropriate level of representation may be granted when proceedings are commenced. This means that inexperienced lawyers may not be able to identify the issues correctly at the earliest stage. We immediately recognise that this is an area of complexity because it can be very difficult to determine at an early stage what level of legal representation is required.

10.23 Since changes to the legal aid scheme were introduced in April 2015, the LSA has confirmed that only 1% of cases in the FPC are certified for counsel. Concern has been raised about the certification criteria. The lack of certification for specialist family barristers is likely to lead to delay in identifying the core issues, late transfer of cases to the appropriate tier and a higher incidence of appeals. These are factors that lead to delay in resolving the child’s situation. The legal complexity of many family law cases is rooted in the factual matrix, and the expertise that the family Bar contributes is recognised by the judiciary as an important factor in resolving cases expeditiously.

10.24 As we highlighted in chapter 6, there is a need for greater access to training for family judges, which should include rigorous case management and workload management. There has been perhaps a failure to recognise that this is an area that demands acquired expertise and training. The provision of judicial training for family judges would achieve greater consistency in approach and encourage judges to adopt new and effective work practices.

10.25 There is an inconsistent use of the Public Law Outline between court tiers regionally.

10.26 The lack of training and support generally within the family judiciary has led to isolated judges struggling to deal with increased workloads with inadequate administrative assistance.

10.27 We consider elsewhere in this Report\(^8\) the need for a dedicated court with expertise in dealing with parents struggling with addiction. This represents an opportunity to embrace innovative methods of achieving reunification of families.

10.28 There is unacceptable delay in determining appeals, particularly in the High Court, albeit this is a matter that is currently being addressed. It was not uncommon for appeals to be heard many months after the initial judicial decision. This fails to take account of the timetable for the child and the effect of uncertainty on the child’s welfare.

10.29 The delay in determining cases involving allegations of non-accidental injury (NAI) at all judicial tiers has caused particular injustice because a child may be removed from the care of their parents in circumstances where parental care may prove to have been faultless.

10.30 Some to whom we spoke claimed that the Police Service of Northern Ireland (PSNI) regularly fails to adhere to the protocol for the provision of relevant documentation in NAI cases and that these cases are often delayed because of a failure on the part of PSNI either to provide relevant information or to progress the investigation. We appreciate that criminal investigations may take time and present particular challenges. However, any delay in providing relevant documentation in NAI cases will inevitably have a knock-on effect.

10.31 There is no reliable management information available to the judiciary to enable informed decisions to be made about workload or to identify the causes of delay as cases are progressing through the system.

\(^8\) See chapter 12.
10.32 There is no dedicated family judicial leadership role at FPC or FCC level with a direct link to the Senior Family Judge to ensure that problems are quickly identified and resolved throughout the system.

10.33 An argument has surfaced that the failure of trusts to undertake parallel planning and to progress kinship viability and other assessments at an early stage has been a significant cause of delay in effective case management. There is no consistency between trusts regarding practice and procedure. Even when the court has deemed an assessment necessary, some trusts require authorisation from a resource panel before putting arrangements in place, and some FCCs will not undertake an assessment in the absence of psychological assessment(s) of the parents. Such an assessment is likely to require legal aid approval, which builds in an extra layer of delay. Whether or not that argument is completely accurate, we would wish trusts to undertake parallel planning and to progress kinship viability and other assessments at an early stage as we know that would help to reduce delay and promote effective case management.

10.34 Social workers and guardians often attend hearings unnecessarily, thus reducing their effectiveness in child protection. The time spent travelling to and from court, and waiting for cases to be dealt with, means that valuable resources are lost. Social workers need time and space to do social work. If social workers and guardians are to improve the quality of analysis on which the court depends, and thereby reduce the number of time-consuming and expensive experts’ reports, there needs to be a significant change of culture.

10.35 Court staff are often required to draft complex court orders. While it is usual for legal representatives to provide a draft of proposed directions, they may need substantial amendment in light of the case management discussion. This places an unfair burden on staff and increases the possibility of error. The Family Court Office in Belfast reports that 95% of orders are drafted by clerical staff with no legal qualifications (albeit the orders are checked by office managers) and a similar situation exists in the FCC and FPC. However, this does have the advantage that orders are issued within five days and on the same day in emergency cases (for example, under art. 4 or art. 56 of the Children Order).

10.36 Social workers and guardians are not able to access ICOS (integrated court operations system) in order to download court orders. It is understood that currently only members of the legal profession can do so, if appropriately trained.

10.37 The expectations of the judiciary and the legal profession are possibly not sufficiently appreciated by the social work profession and, if this is the case, it could lead to a lowering of morale amongst social workers, which is undesirable.

10.38 The Children Order Advisory Committee (COAC) is widely regarded as somewhat cumbersome, less effective than it should be and arguably conceptually outdated.
Discussion

CASE MANAGEMENT

10.39 Effective case management is directly linked to the information contained in the initial trust application and throughout the proceedings. It is also directly linked to the availability of appropriate levels of legal representation at the outset of proceedings. Unless the judge is enabled to identify the key issues to be resolved, effective case management is impossible. A new listing policy designed to ensure that judges have time to read essential information and identify the issues, the evidence and the options at the earliest stage must be based on the premise that all relevant assessments will be completed before proceedings are commenced, save in an emergency. In saying this, we also recognise that time spent prior to the hearing in discussions between counsel and the professional witnesses is often time well spent in assisting case management decisions. Moreover, the innovation of both morning and afternoon slots for listing may be of assistance.

10.40 It should be expected that legal representatives will have been instructed, and legal aid granted, in sufficient time to allow a proper consideration of the issues in advance of the first directions hearing. A rigorous focus on the quality of evidence and analysis should result in the requirement for fewer court hearings. The savings for trusts in legal costs and the costs of professionals spending time unnecessarily attending court should mean resources are available for faster and better assessments, which in turn should reduce the number of expert reports required.

10.41 There needs to be a change in culture so that the judge decides what issues are key to resolving the child’s situation and the evidence that is needed to achieve that. Currently, valuable court time, which is a finite resource, is spent resolving marginal disputes by way of C2 applications. This causes delay in finalising cases, which is the priority.

10.42 The current transfer arrangements have been identified as a major cause of delay. As we set out in more detail in chapter 5, we are strongly in favour of the abolition of the FPC and FCC and the creation of a single family court with the jurisdiction of the High Court preserved. Decisions on allocations will be based on the most appropriate judge available for the case, taking into account deployment of information and guidance relating to complexity. It will end the current delay endemic in a system, where, belatedly, one tier decides to transfer a case to another tier long after it has first been processed and dealt with.

10.43 The level of legal representation should be directly linked to the complexity of the issues instead of the tier of judge who is allocated to hear the case. This would represent an acknowledgement of the current artificiality of the allocation process and would also allow for the most appropriate deployment of judicial resources.

10.44 The unnecessary attendance of professionals at review and directions hearings is due to a failure to take instructions in advance, and also because those involved in the case often wish to be present. The response of the Northern Ireland Association of Social Workers reminded us that the current legal aid budget for family law does not take into account the time spent by social workers trying to resolve difficulties on behalf of the court. In October 2016, in reply to a written question, the Minister of Health revealed that there were 970 requests made by family courts to the five health and social care trusts for welfare reports under art. 4 of The Children Order (Northern Ireland) 1995 in the period 2014–15. The minister was unable to calculate the cost of this, but it is obviously very substantial indeed. There is an obvious solution to this problem — namely, in the form of technology. Video link facilities, telephonic links or Skype should be available at social service and Northern Ireland Guardian Ad Litem Agency (NIGALA) premises, so that those who wish to hear the representations or, indeed, to give evidence can do so in a way that least impacts on their professional effectiveness. This would ensure that valuable professional time is spent in the primary child protection role. Already this is happening. Responses drew to our attention the practice of Master Wells to make ample use of telephone conferencing in uncontentious matters. None of this is to suggest that we failed to recognise that in some cases the availability of professionals to meet face to face with counsel has a role to play in decision-making, but it should be sparingly invoked in most interlocutory matters.

10.45 Legal representatives should also be able to avail themselves of technology so that their professional time is used appropriately. Video link, telephonic links and Skype need again to be available, although it is understood that there are concerns surrounding secure communication with Skype. There is also a professional conduct matter regarding the appropriateness of direct communication between the Bar and other professionals for the purposes of taking instructions, in the absence of a solicitor. Whilst this may avoid the necessity of a social worker or guardian attending court, there may be other issues that will need further consideration but are clearly not insoluble.

10.46 Regarding technology generally, it should not be forgotten that justice must take place in public, and technology must ensure consistency with this principle. This is particularly important within the family justice system, where public confidence requires transparency and accountability. What we should seek to achieve by technology is increased access to justice, due process and the right to be heard in a reasonable time. It is, of course, possible to achieve this by hearings in public, whereby parties give evidence or make representations by video link, telephone conferencing, Skype or other means.

10.47 There is an important caveat: experience has taught us that technology works well if it is of an appropriate quality and, sadly, that is often not the case within the current court system.

10.48 Clearly, however, there is enormous scope for digital improvements in court documentation, particularly during the pre-trial process. Cases should be capable of being filed online and, as the cases progresses, documents should be added online. The current voluminous court bundles are labour-intensive and inefficient to access. Consideration should be given to e-filing — virtual bundles — accessible to all, with a standard index that all parties can add to as the case progresses. We deal with the concept of the paperless court in more detail in chapter 14.

COURT ORDERS

10.49 After each hearing, at least in the High Court and FCC (or the new one-tier system recommended previously⁹), the legal representative for the applicant should be responsible for emailing an agreed interim court order to the judge for approval, and onward transmission to the clerk. This would reduce the burden on staff and eliminate the possibility of error. Currently in the FCC and High Court, counsel and/or solicitors for the applicant, including the directorate of legal services, do draft interim court orders for anything more complicated than simple adjournments. Representatives for the directorate of legal services (who most frequently appear for applicants in public law proceedings) indicated a wish to record that the directorate does not agree with this proposal, specifically in relation to the FPC, where the volume is a major problem as this has traditionally been the role of the court clerk.

JUDICIAL TRAINING AND LEADERSHIP

10.50 Judges need to be trained in proactive case management. Training should focus on leadership skills to ensure an inquisitorial rather than an adversarial approach, whilst engaging collaboratively with the parties and other professionals. A formal communication and Judicial Studies Board training structure should be developed for family judges, and a collegiate approach should be encouraged to provide support and encouragement.

10.51 Family court judges at all levels, whilst meeting together on disparate occasions, lack a total family justice immersion conference to discuss detailed topics relevant to family justice, such as the voice of the child or the approach to personal litigants. In England, the President of the Family Division holds a conference once a year, when all the family judges get together for a meeting at Highgate. Without exception, every family judge in England to whom we spoke has found this invaluable.

10.52 The concept of awaydays, where family judges convene jointly at a venue outside the courts to debate and discuss current issues, is vital and is followed in most other jurisdictions. The isolation of family judges needs to be addressed urgently. One solution might be to have dedicated family hearing centres — for example, three in total where judges at all tiers can work together and informally share ideas and difficulties (see also chapter 5) on this development in a single-tier system.

APPEALS

10.53 The delay in hearing appeals is a major cause for concern. All appeals should be fast-tracked and determined within a strict time period. Our initial view had been that a time limit of 21 days, save in exceptional circumstances, should be fixed for the hearing of all appeals. However, the responses from the legal professions have persuaded us that that is too tight a schedule and that 42 days is a more realistic aspiration. It may be appropriate to allocate specific responsibility for appeals to a particular judge or judges so that appeals do not interfere with cases already listed. The LSA should also fast-track legal aid decisions in appeals. The Court of Appeal has a system whereby every family justice appeal is brought to the attention of the Lord Chief Justice upon it reaching the court office and is listed for review and date fixing within seven days. A similar system should be developed in the lower courts.

JUDGMENTS

10.54 All written judicial decisions in public law cases at each tier should be published to ensure transparency and accountability. Where a written judgment is not available, a transcript of the decision and the reasons should be made available, which can be understood by those not directly connected with the case. In this way, public confidence in the family justice system can be maintained. Identifying information should obviously be redacted. Clearly, if this objective is to be achieved, judges at all tiers need time for judgment writing, which currently is not made available.

10.55 In chapter 18 we refer to the implementation in this jurisdiction of the practice guidance issued on 16 January 2014 by Sir James Munby, the President of the Family Division, which was issued with the intention of bringing about an immediate change in practice in relation to the publication of judgments in family courts.10

FAMILY DRUG AND ALCOHOL COURT

10.56 Improving the chances for parents struggling with addiction needs a fresh approach. Consideration should be given to establishing a new family drug and alcohol court based on the English model as adverted to in chapter 12.

NON-ACCIDENTAL INJURIES/EXPERTS

10.57 The particular problems with delay in cases involving allegations of non-accidental injury must be addressed. This is a key area requiring expert evidence, yet the unavailability of suitably qualified experts is a major cause of concern. Consideration has been given to the recommendations of Sir Liam Donaldson, former chief medical officer for England in his 2006 report, Bearing Good Witness: Proposals for Reforming the Delivery of Medical Expert Evidence in Family Law Cases, and the responses to the public consultation that followed.

10.58 The main proposals were the establishment of multidisciplinary teams within National Health Service (NHS) trusts to provide expert evidence to the family courts. It was envisaged that the NHS would be fully reimbursed for taking on this additional work by local authorities and the Legal Services Agency (LSA). Service contracts or service level agreements would be entered into with local NHS providers, representing a public investment in the assurance that these services would be available without delay and with the authority that courts require.

10.59 The vision was that individual solicitors would decide which NHS team they wanted to approach, depending on expertise. Each team would be led by a named medical consultant, who would take responsibility for coordinating the initial response to the instructions given and for ensuring that the appropriate health experts contributed to the report and were ready to give oral evidence on their aspect of the report.

10.60 The responses to the consultation identified a number of concerns with these proposals. As well as concerns about time constraints and possible conflict between a requirement to assist the courts and the team’s clinical responsibilities, there was a fear that team working might lead to ‘cosy consensus’, restricting scope for divergences of view or opinion. The possibility of junior team members adopting the views of the team leader was raised. On consideration, the recommendations are unlikely to solve the problem of expert availability whilst ensuring the necessary independence of opinion. The potential for miscarriages of justice in this type of case is particularly concerning and there must be no compromise in the quality of expert opinion obtained.

10.61 However, improvements in timescale could be achieved by particularly robust case management in these cases. They should be fast-tracked by the courts and trusts should be required to have all medical notes and records available when proceedings are lodged. It is not uncommon for notes and records of treating clinicians to be unavailable even a number of weeks after proceedings have commenced. Given that we have an integrated health and social care system in Northern Ireland, it should be relatively easy to put arrangements in place so that this problem (the timely availability of medical notes or records) can be resolved. This should ensure that the most appropriate experts are identified at the earliest stage.

10.62 The whole climate has changed regarding experts in Northern Ireland, with judges permitting papers to be released only where an expert is really necessary and it is expected that the issue of experts is addressed at the earliest possible stage. Hence, it is rare for more than one expert report to be allowed in any discipline. This is now so well established that there are hardly ever any applications for a second expert. Thus, a single expert is usually instructed.

10.63 The key is early identification of experts with sufficient information being provided to the court at the outset. The care proceedings pilot is working on a new format for court reports as part of its remit.

10.64 Agreement on the identity of the expert can usually be achieved without much difficulty and, if there is disagreement, the judge will decide which expert has the most appropriate expertise. Delay in providing a report is always a factor taken into account.

10.65 However, what frequently happens is that the parents will refuse to join in the instruction, not because they disagree with the choice of expert but on the basis that they want to keep their powder dry in the event that the expert’s opinion is unfavourable.

10.66 Judges regularly make it clear that the fact that an expert’s opinion is unfavourable is not a ground for allowing papers to be released to another expert, unless some factual error was apparent or the methodology was questionable.

10.67 Led by Mr Justice O’Hara, the Senior Family Judge, along with the other judges at different tiers, consideration is being given to looking more closely at limiting the volume of documentation that is forwarded to experts and the number and range of questions that they are instructed to answer. All of this is aimed at focusing and reducing their work and, therefore, the delay and cost involved in engaging them. This is an issue of particular importance in family cases in which it is virtually inevitable that the reports will be publicly rather than privately funded.

10.68 Close scrutiny is also currently being given to the length and format of social work reports to try to reduce duplication. In particular, we are looking at Understanding the Needs of Children in Northern Ireland (UNOCINI) reports, which were intended to contain all relevant issues but which are often quite impenetrable. Anecdotally, it has emerged that social workers find completing them cumbersome, time-consuming and wasteful of resources. Meetings between some of the judges at different levels and the principal practitioners from each trust are soon to occur to address some of these points and to discuss a fresh format.

10.69 The Senior Family Judge has also indicated the introduction of a limit on the length of expert reports, which as a matter of routine can often exceed 100 pages. The limit will be 50 pages (which is still arguably excessive) unless there are exceptional circumstances. This echoes the approach adopted by Sir James Munby in England and Wales.

10.70 The system for remunerating experts from the public purse is unnecessarily bureaucratic, lacks transparency and is a significant cause of delay. Consequently, the small pool of available experts has diminished further, with experts unwilling to undertake publicly funded work, to the detriment of parents in particular. The judiciary has already made specific recommendations for reform of the legal aid system as part of the public consultation on the use of expert witnesses. We favour a system of accreditation of experts with the LSA — accredited, for example, with the Academy of Experts — together with the implementation of regulations, similar to those that exist in England, fixing an hourly rate (which must be struck at a comparable level to the rates paid by the trusts to avoid allegations of second-rate experts for non-trust experts) and a standard number of hours. This would serve to avoid, in most instances, the present system whereby the LSA demands the time-consuming exercise of requiring three quotations before authorising the choice of expert.
MULTIDISCIPLINARY TRAINING

10.71 It is essential that consideration is given to a structured, multidisciplinary approach to training for the judiciary, social workers and the legal professions. Judges need to be kept informed of peer-reviewed and accepted research into outcomes for children to ensure good judicial practice. Social workers and guardians need to have the confidence to come to court and explain the analysis on which their recommendations are based. A specific training programme for social workers in particular, which involves court practice and the involvement of the legal profession and the judiciary, may help to break down barriers and create better mutual understanding. This may also raise the morale of the social work profession and ensure a more effective justice system.

10.72 Under the spur of the Senior Family Judge, Mr Justice O’Hara, and Her Honour Judge Smyth, steps have been taken since 2013 to address the question of training for family judges. In August 2014 Her Honour Judge Smyth devised a three-day family judges course for all family judges and newly appointed judges. There followed meetings of family judges, two or three times a year, to discuss problems. In January 2017, Mrs Justice Keegan, Mr Justice O’Hara and Her Honour Judge Smyth delivered a two-day training course that included addresses from two senior social workers. The purpose was to provoke debate on issues, including case management, expert reports and permanency planning. Further addresses were given by a distinguished psychologist on the issue of addiction and expert medical evidence. It is proposed that there should be a minimum of three half-day sessions a year involving speakers on specified topics, followed by discussion, which will include expert advice on, for example, when and how to meet children. This programme, which has been specifically approved and encouraged by the Lord Chief Justice, will not only increase the level of expertise but encourage a vital exchange of views between family judges who currently sit in isolated courts.

ACCREDITATION

10.73 The law relating to children is a specialised area requiring special skills. The direction of travel must be towards more specialisation and expertise in the representation they receive. It occurs in other aspects of the law. Thus, for example, there is a requirement that a solicitor who undertakes a conveyancing transaction in a calendar year, for monetary consideration or not, must devote three of the requisite 10 hours’ group study continuing professional development (CPD) to conveyancing courses. All solicitors must certify each year that they have or have not undertaken a conveyancing transaction. The Legal Complaints and Regulation Act (Northern Ireland) 2016 recognises this development. We recommend that the Law Society introduce a compulsory accreditation system for those solicitors accepting instructions in cases under the Children Order. There is currently an approved list held by the Law Society for practitioners taking on such cases but inclusion on the list is not an obligatory requirement for accepting such instructions. This should change as soon as possible. Equally so, there should be accreditation for members of the Bar in such cases. Appropriate steps should be taken by the Bar in advance of the implementation of the provisions of the Act to set up a system of accreditation in such cases.

FREEING FOR ADOPTION

10.74 Freeing for adoption is an area that requires special consideration. The current position is that one of the proofs in a freeing for adoption application is that there is a likely placement within a year of such an order. This is for placement only; it is not that the child has to be adopted within the year.

10.75 Art. 19(3) of The Adoption (Northern Ireland) Order 1987 requires the trust to notify the former parent ‘within the 14 days following the date 12 months after the making of the order freeing the child for adoption’ if an adoption order has been made or if the child has been placed for adoption. Birth parents can opt out of this notification if they declare that they prefer not to be involved in future questions regarding the adoption of the child.

10.76 It then rests with the prospective adopters to apply for the adoption order. Usually, this is the first and only time they are parties to any application regarding the child. The trust can place the child within a year but cannot force the prospective adopters to make their application.

10.77 The current system works tolerably well in the majority of cases. However, difficulties arise occasionally. Sometimes these are due to the children who are hard to place either through their age or complex needs or there are significant developments in the prospective adopters’ lives.

10.78 Improved procedures are required to minimise drift in these difficult cases.

10.79 One suggestion is to maintain the presence of the guardian ad litem (GAL) in the case from freeing to adoption. The NIGALA view is that this is worthy of consideration and may not necessarily be limited to ‘exceptional circumstances’. However, I also understand that public consultation on a draft Adoption and Children Bill has recently been undertaken and that the Bill contains a range of provisions aimed at tackling delay in the adoption process. It is anticipated that these provisions, when implemented, should address the issues highlighted.

10.80 A less expensive option is to set up a measure of formal notification from the trust to the court one year and 14 days after the freeing order is granted, either in addition to or replacing the current requirement to notify both parents. We note that in its response the Health and Social Care Board accepts this suggestion.

10.81 This could take the form of a copy of the notification to the birth parents (if that requirement remains) and/or a ‘progress report’ for the court. The judge then could make appropriate directions for each individual case on a case-by-case basis, including requesting more detailed information, reappointing the GAL, joining the birth parents and/or prospective adopters and holding a formal review. The court could timetable for an early revocation of the freeing in appropriate cases. This system would have the advantage of giving some formal mechanism for the children whose birth parents have opted not to receive any further details.

10.82 Practically, the trusts might agree to do this voluntarily and, if so, it could quickly get up and running.

10.83 Legislative change will be required for implementation.

TIME LIMITS

10.84 We mention one final discrete area. The care proceedings pilot is looking at the question of statutory time limits for care proceedings.

10.85 There is a 26-week limit introduced in England for care proceedings, which is enshrined in s. 14 of the Children and Families Act 2014, which amends s. 32 of the Children Act 1989. This applies to all cases. If it becomes apparent that there is a possibility that the case may exceed 26 weeks, all parties are under an obligation to apply to the court to ask for an extension of the time limit. Extensions have to be strongly justified: it has to be a complex case and/or the interests of justice must require the extension to be granted. It is not an easy application to make. The court may grant extensions of only up to eight weeks at a time. A further extension requires a further application to the court and further justification. Even if it is apparent at the hearing of the first extension request application that the matter will require more than eight weeks to be ready for final hearing, the court can still grant only an eight-week extension but there is discretion to then deal with the further extension application as a paper/administrative exercise. There is case law that confirms that ‘justice must never be sacrificed upon the altar of speed’ and sets out examples (from the President of the Family Division) of circumstances in which it will be appropriate to grant extensions albeit this is not an exhaustive list.\(^{11}\)

10.86 Her Honour Judge Newton from Manchester family court informs us that she has found this time limit invaluable, and it has transformed the position where very often there were cases taking 60 weeks or more. However, a further problem arises with the delay in pre-proceedings. There is no control over what is happening here. She favours a limit of, perhaps, three months for pre-proceedings.

10.87 Regulations and guidance in Scotland set timescales for specific parts of the supervision, permanence order and adoption order processes. However, there is no overall time limit similar to that set in England. Currently, there is no statutory time limit for care proceedings in place in the Republic of Ireland.

10.88 The issue of mandatory time limits for care proceedings had been discussed in Northern Ireland, and two contrasting views emerged: one in favour and the other strongly opposed. So as not to replicate the work being done by others, it was agreed that no decision or recommendation should be made until the care proceedings pilot has finished and that COAC (or its replacement with a Family Justice Board) had been afforded a full opportunity to examine the outcomes and research carried out here in Northern Ireland.

Responses

10.89 The responses to this chapter were all extremely positive. Other than some of the small matters to which we refer in the course of this chapter, two main concerns arose.

10.90 First, the Bar Council expressed concern about the recommendation that there should be a new model for providing information to the court at the initial application. In particular, it queried whether waiting for all assessments deemed necessary before issuing proceedings would change the speed of the process since it would only add to front-loading before proceedings were issued, which itself can be a source of delay. Moreover, it pointed to the real or perceived risk that in-house trust assessments lack independence and are seen as being utilised for evidential purposes. It suggests that some parents engage in the process only when they have received legal advice and guidance. The Law Society welcomes any improvement where possible on the current system, noting that, at present, the information provided and set out in the trust application is usually quite detailed and informative. Helpfully, it suggests that this could be supplemented in terms of information provided by the trust to include any reports proposed prior to the issue of proceedings and a section summarising core issues. It indicates that experience shows that proceedings are mostly issued when the trust believes a threshold has been met and there is a risk of immediate harm to the child.

10.91 Our thinking remains that the proposal at FJ70 precludes neither an application by the parents to have leave for further evidence called on their own behalf nor the possibility of discussions between their legal representative and the trust bodies. Instead, fuller presentation of assessments and reports from the trust prior to the matter coming before the court presents an infinitely better opportunity for informed case management, assessment of the fundamental problems and direction on the steps to be taken. It serves to focus minds on all sides as to the real issues in the case to ensure as speedy and efficient resolution as possible.

10.92 Secondly, the Bar Council, the Law Society and the Belfast Solicitors’ Association proffered concerns about mandatory accreditation. The Law Society draws attention to the general professional obligation that is a cornerstone of the Solicitors Practice Regulations 1987 and the risks involved in stepping outside these boundaries in terms of client care. It notes that the professional training received by solicitors and the requirement to undertake continuing professional development act as a counterweight towards following a model based on accredited specialisms across all areas of law. It suggests that the current system works well and those practitioners with membership of the children’s panel advertise this clearly to clients as a badge of further specialism. It records that making the system mandatory may impact on the ability of junior solicitors to gain appropriate experience under the supervision of a Master due to reducing the area of work available.
10.93 Similarly, the Bar is opposed to the recommendation of an accreditation scheme for members of the Bar in cases under the 1995 Children Order. It asserts that family practitioners are already regulated and abide by the code of conduct for the Bar of Northern Ireland. It observes, however, that it has no objection to the suggestion of a mandatory specialist training programme focused on family law for practitioners.

10.94 In our view the Legal Complaints and Regulation Act (Northern Ireland) 2016 is a clear precursor to the need for further accreditation. To suggest otherwise is to run against the legislative tide. We believe that both the Law Society and the Bar Council should be proactive in these matters and take the steps we have recommended to set up a system of accreditation. In saying this, we note that every other body that responded on this subject was in favour of accreditation being imposed on the legal professions.

Recommendations

CASE MANAGEMENT

1. A new model for providing information to the court at initial application stage to be developed. [FJ70]

2. Judges to be given specific time to read essential documentation and prepare for each hearing. Case listing should make provision for this. [FJ71]

3. Court lists to reflect the need for in-depth case management, particularly at first directions stage. [FJ72]

4. Judges to determine only the key issues that will affect the ultimate outcome of the case. Peripheral disagreements should be resolved between the parties without the intervention of the court wherever possible. [FJ73]

5. Social workers and guardians routinely to take part in directions and review hearings by video link, telephone or Skype. [FJ74]

6. Technology and virtual reality courts to be extended to appearances by legal representatives. [FJ75]

COURT ORDERS

7. After each hearing in the High Court and Family Care Centres (or of the new one-tier family court, if set up), the trust representative to email an agreed court order to the judge for approval and onwards transmission to the clerk. [FJ76]

8. Any order made by a family court to remain in force until the conclusion of the proceedings, or until further order. [FJ77]

APPEALS

9. All appeals to be determined within 42 days of the initial decision, save in exceptional circumstances. Such circumstances do not include legal aid difficulties, unavailability of counsel or unavailability of judicial resources. [FJ78]
NON-ACCIDENTAL INJURIES

10. Cases involving alleged non-accidental injury to be fast-tracked at all stages. [FJ79]

11. Arrangements to be agreed between social services and the health and social care trusts to ensure the timely provision of medical information in non-accidental injury cases. [FJ80]

JUDGMENTS

12. All written judgments to be published to ensure transparency and public accountability, subject to appropriate steps regarding anonymisation. Steps need to be taken to ensure that there is a recording made of every court where family proceedings are heard so that, if necessary, at least a CD of the hearing can be made available upon reasonable request. [FJ81]

JUDICIAL TRAINING AND LEADERSHIP

13. The Judicial Studies Board to develop a dedicated family training team tasked with the delivery of ongoing quality training. Attendance at training events should be mandatory. [FJ82]

- A multidisciplinary training team should be developed, resourced under the auspices of a new Family Justice Board.12

- There should be specific leadership role(s), with management responsibilities in a new family court, accountable to the High Court Family Judge.

- There should be regular meetings of all family judges arranged by the designated High Court Family Judge. This should build on the excellent work currently being orchestrated by Mr Justice O’Hara.

- The proposed management information system, which has been developed by the Northern Ireland judiciary, and modelled on the English case management system (CMS), should be progressed by the Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service. This will inform those judges with management responsibilities regarding workload and the effectiveness of current practices, and will enable problems within the system to be quickly identified and resolved.

EXPERTS

14. Trusts to be required to have all medical notes and records available when proceedings are lodged. This should ensure that the most appropriate experts are identified at the earliest stage. [FJ83]

15. Judges to permit papers to be released only where an expert is really necessary. Serious consideration must always be given as to whether more than one expert report is to be allowed in any discipline. [FJ84]

16. Judges to make it clear that the fact that an expert’s opinion is unfavourable is not necessarily a ground for allowing papers to be released to another expert,

12 See chapter 20.
unless some factual error was apparent or the methodology was questionable. [FJ85]

17. Limits to be placed on the volume of documentation that is forwarded to experts and the number and range of questions which they are instructed to answer. [FJ86]

18. Judges to be encouraged to place limits on the length of expert reports. [FJ87]

19. A new attitude to expert evidence to be implemented. [FJ88]

ACCREDITATION

20. The Law Society to introduce a compulsory accreditation system for those solicitors accepting instructions in cases under The Children Order (Northern Ireland) 1995. Equally, there should be accreditation for members of the Bar in this type of case. [FJ89]

21. The Legal Services Agency to set up a system of accredited experts with a scale set of fees. [FJ90]

SINGLE-TIER SYSTEM (SEE CHAPTER 5)

22. The abolition of the FPC and FCC and the creation of a new family court. The High Court will remain as a separate entity hearing only those cases designated as being of sufficient complexity or containing novel points as to justify hearing by a High Court judge. [FJ91]

REGIONAL MODELS OF BEST PRACTICE

23. All trusts should have regionally agreed, streamlined procedures relating to the family law system, and a regional model of best practice in this area should be developed. [FJ92]

ROLE OF GUARDIAN AD LITEM IN FREEING ORDERS

24. The court should have the power in exceptional circumstances to reintroduce the guardian ad litem after a freeing order is made and before an application for adoption has been mounted. This is a matter that requires urgent consideration when the long overdue new Northern Ireland adoption legislation finally is introduced. [FJ93]

Secure accommodation orders

Current position

11.1 There are limited circumstances within which the liberty of a child in the care of the state may be restricted. Under art. 44(2) of The Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995, a health and social care trust may apply to a magistrates’ court to admit a child to secure care if the child meets one or all of the following criteria:

- They have a history of absconding and are likely to abscond from any other description of accommodation.
- If they abscond, they are likely to suffer significant harm or if kept in any other description of accommodation.
- They are likely to injure themselves or other persons. Guidance and regulations accompanying the Order\(^1\) state: ‘restricting the liberty of children is a serious step which must be taken only when there is no appropriate alternative. It must be a “last resort” in the sense that all else must first have been comprehensively considered and rejected — never because no other placement was available at the relevant time, because of inadequacies in staffing, because the child is simply being a nuisance or runs away from his accommodation and is not likely to suffer significant harm in doing so, and never as a form of punishment’.

11.2 In considering the possibility of a secure placement, the guidance and regulations emphasise the importance of ‘a clear understanding of the aims and objectives of such a placement and that those providing the accommodation can fully meet those aims and objectives.’ They specify that the trusts have a duty under this Order ‘to take reasonable steps designed to avoid the need for children within their area to be placed in secure accommodation’.\(^2\) It is expected that careful consideration will be given to the existing range of alternative facilities and services available locally, with trusts identifying any gaps or inadequacies in such provision and how these might best be addressed by the trust itself or in cooperation with other agencies.

11.3 The Children (Secure Accommodation) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1996 provide the statutory framework for restriction of liberty in a facility that can be physically secured. No child under the age of 13 may be placed in secure accommodation without the prior approval of the Department of Health (DoH).\(^3\) Without court authority, the maximum period for the restriction of a child’s liberty is 72 hours, either consecutively or in aggregate in any period of 28 days.\(^4\) Thereafter, the trust has to apply to the magistrates’ court for a secure accommodation order (SAO) under art. 44 of the Children Order. The maximum period for which a court may authorise a child to be kept in secure accommodation is three months in the first instance, although on subsequent applications the court may authorise secure accommodation for a period not exceeding six months at any one time. Art. 44 does not apply to a child detained under the provisions of The Mental Health (Northern Ireland) Order 1986.

11.4 During 2014–15, there were 50 admissions of 46 children from across Northern Ireland to Lakewood Regional Secure Care Centre. The average length of placement in Lakewood is 16 weeks. As a significant number of children are admitted in advance of a formal court application for an SAO, young people are transported to and from Lakewood and the court for SAO application hearings.

11.5 Each journey is subject to a risk assessment, and those young people considered too high a risk to be safely transported to and from court can have their hearing at Lakewood. Between January 2014 and March 2015, there had been 29 court sittings at Lakewood involving 16 young people.

11.6 The exclusion of live link for art. 44 SAO applications has been the subject of discussion at the Children Order Advisory Committee (COAC) in the past. Arguments for include the risks posed by and to children in the transportation to and from court; arguments against include the possible dilution of the child’s rights if they are not physically present at the court hearing.

11.7 In 2012, the Department of Justice consulted on a number of proposals to extend the use of live link in courts, including the extension to breach proceedings at the Juvenile Justice Centre. The consultation document cited reducing delay and security risks associated with bringing a person to court as two reasons for its extension. It did acknowledge, under ‘equality considerations’, the impact on young people under 18 but emphasised that children would be able to participate in proceedings whilst remaining in a safe and controlled environment. It also proposed that legislation would provide for a requirement of consent from the young person.

11.8 The DoH position is that, where possible, a child should be physically present in a court when an SAO application is being made. It is accepted that it may not always be possible to eradicate the risks associated with transporting a young person to court and, for that reason, we have to explore whether it is possible to introduce changes that are efficient and, at the same time, promote the rights of children and young people. A DoH options paper on extending the use of live link in art. 44 (secure care) applications was submitted to COAC members on 28 November 2015 to consider whether they wished to further explore arrangements on use of live link for SAO applications. It was noted that, of the responses received, there was a variation in the choice of options but the preferred option appeared to be that of a designated judge to conduct all such hearings at Lakewood.

Current legal position

11.9 In Sakhnovskiy v Russia [GC] App no 21272/03, §112, 2 November 2010, at paragraph 98, the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) held in a live links case concerning an adult that ‘this form of proceedings is not, as such, incompatible with the notion of a fair and public hearing, but it must be ensured that the applicant is able to follow the proceedings and to be heard without technical impediments, and that effective and confidential communication with a lawyer is provided for’.

11.10 Moreover, the use of live links must not impact on the ability of a person to effectively participate in proceedings. In SC v UK, a case concerning a criminal trial of an 11-year-old, the ECtHR set out at paragraph 29 that ‘effective participation’ in this context presupposes that the accused has a broad understanding of the nature of the trial process and of what is at stake for him or her, including the significance of any penalty which may be imposed. It means that he or she, if necessary with the assistance of, for example, an interpreter, lawyer, social worker, or friend, should be able to understand the general thrust of what is said in court. The defendant should be able to follow what is said by the prosecution witnesses and, if represented, to explain to his own lawyers his version of events, point out any statements with which he disagrees and make them aware of any facts which should be put forward in his defence.

Paragraph 35 states that ‘it is essential that he be tried in a specialist tribunal which is able to give full consideration to, and make proper allowance for, the handicaps under which he labours and adapt its procedures accordingly’.

11.11 In Manchester, there are instances where live link is used in the processing of SAOs where, for example, a child had to travel from a centre at Southampton. The experience of live link has been a successful one. Discussion does take place with the representatives of the child to ascertain if this is acceptable. Judge Newton, the presiding family judge, informs us, however, that the sheer costs involved in having a number of escorts taking a child from Southampton to Manchester is simply not acceptable.

Discussion

11.12 We were clear throughout our discussions that the live links option should be contemplated only in exceptional circumstances and that the presence of lawyers and other representatives alongside other safeguards for the child must always be in place.

11.13 Views that emerged varied. The use of live links in Woodlands was raised with the youth justice review team by the Children’s Law Centre and the latter was opposed to the concept. The centre feels that each child needs to have their voice heard in court and video link prevents that. The Children’s Commissioner shared that view.

7 Youth Justice Review Team, A Review of the Youth Justice System in Northern Ireland, Department of Justice, 2011.
11.14 However, the experience of the youth justice review team was the opposite: its youth court experiences were chaotic and those cases that were heard via video link were the only time the room was sufficiently quiet to hear a child communicating and engaging (rather than being talked at or talked over) for those present. From its perspective, the use of live links has been found to be beneficial in a number of ways. Not having to bring the young person to court greatly reduces many risks, including escaping in transit or absconding from court, as well as safety issues while they are detained in court cells, access to prohibited items while at court etc.

11.15 Its view was that the travel and arrangements to ensure attendance at court meant disruption to the young person’s routine, attendance at school and adjusting to residential life. Young people also expressed a view to the team that the live link is much less intimidating than being in the courtroom as staff are beside them in video link and can clarify and explain issues they do not understand.

11.16 An evaluation study appears to have been commissioned by the Northern Ireland Office in 2008: ‘Evaluation of the Woodlands Juvenile Justice Centre Youth Court Video Link’ looked closely at the technical, financial and administrative arrangements required to enable the system to work and also compared findings and costings of escorting young people between the Juvenile Justice Centre and courts. General findings were that the video link system and arrangements were secure, efficient, well organised and effectively staffed.

11.17 The study demonstrated that the use of video link reduces considerably the time involved in a court visit and highlighted that the costs involved, as compared with the costs of transporting young people to courts across Northern Ireland, are significantly reduced. Obviously, however, the cost factor is not the primary consideration in determining what is best for a young person. Discrete issues arise in the context of the use of technology in SAOs.

11.18 A further option was to hold all court hearings at Lakewood — with a nominated judge — rather than have any young person travelling to and from court for SAO applications. This had the advantage that the child would have a personal connection to a familiar judge, particularly where they are appearing for multiple hearings. There would be effective determination of the child’s competency to give instructions and understand proceedings. Judicial familiarity with cases, patterns and trends might reduce delays and improve logistics. It could reduce costs for judges travelling longer distances for hearings. On the other hand, over-reliance on one judge to hear SAO applications and hold timetabling hearings at Lakewood fails to take account of a family judge’s other court work and could be a challenging task for an already overstretched family judiciary. For that reason, we do not favour it.

11.19 The argument in favour of live link with Lakewood in the context of the use of modern technology in exceptional circumstances can be summarised as follows.
11.20 First, consideration should be given to allowing the courts the power to conduct hearings by way of live link on those rare occasions when there is evidence before the court that it is in the interests of those accompanying the children to the courts and the safety of the children themselves.

11.21 Secondly, when the court is notified that it is too dangerous to transport the young person to court because they will abscond, the court regularly ends up setting up a court at Lakewood. This is expensive and very inconvenient because lay magistrates and the district judge have to vacate their court sitting, progress to Lakewood and subsequently return to the original court for the rest of the court list. If it is a case from one of the county courts, a different district judge and additional lay magistrates have to be used as it would not be possible to get back in time for an ordinary court list. Such a system cannot be in the interests of efficient, timely or cost-saving justice in a modern context, where these are important factors throughout the justice process. An increased number of hearings at Lakewood may require some capital costs associated with the reconfiguring of the Lakewood hearing room to ensure it is of a high standard.

11.22 Thirdly, in 2014, the South Eastern Health and Social Care Trust installed IT equipment to facilitate videoconferencing in order to create more effective communication among its staff across the region. Whilst not intended for use by the young people during court proceedings, this could be used for live link purposes, thereby reducing the extent of capital investment. However, as engagement with the young person is central to the process, effective visual and sound quality is paramount.

11.23 Fourthly, hearings would take place in a safe, controlled and familiar environment. Children are well used to links by Skype and Facebook and would readily feel at home under the new system on the rare occasions it was implemented.

11.24 The arguments against a live link system can be summarised as follows.

11.25 First, the common law rights of such a child to attend a court hearing and their art. 6 rights under the European Convention on Human Rights demand to be respected but are not adequately met through a video link ‘attendance’ at hearings when one of the outcomes could be a lengthy period in custody.

11.26 Secondly, these children are amongst the most vulnerable in our society. To deprive them of attendance in person in court denies a direct engagement face-to-face with the judge and lay panel, which enables the panel to observe the young person, how they present and project themselves and relay their feelings through their countenance and body language. The way they conduct themselves and interact with their parents, legal team, social workers, the guardian ad litem (GAL) and other interested parties should be viewed other than on a small screen.

11.27 The inherent limitations mean they are not observed in a natural way afforded to other children and young people in the juvenile justice system. The judge would not witness the child under pressure. The vulnerabilities and a nervous bravado in a brief snapshot could be misjudged and taken out of context. The young person may wish to take time to speak at length with the GAL or parents in response to an issue raised through direct questioning by the judge. The limitations of time on the link would restrict this.

11.28 Thirdly, there will be a need for reports to be read, explained to the young person and instructions taken. These trust reports may be available only on the morning of court. Video link may result in delay if the time for the link has to be extended to allow for this process to take place.

11.29 Fourthly, the young person may have a learning disability, autism, dyslexia, dyspraxia or another disability that could be magnified under the pressure of a need to convey as much as possible via a remote link in a short period. The use of registered intermediaries in courts is addressed in chapter 16. Children and young people, of course, have the benefit of representation by a highly skilled and experienced GAL in public law proceedings, and they will be best placed to assess the young person and how they will react in a highly stressful situation, but this assessment is ongoing and best conducted when the young person is present in court.

11.30 Fifthly, it can be difficult to consult by video link with a young person who, by virtue of the fact that they are in secure accommodation, is vulnerable. They are often on edge or hyper at hearings, which makes consulting and taking instructions in person difficult. This might only be amplified if done by video link.

11.31 Whilst we recognise the weight of these objections, we are satisfied that they can all be met in the rare circumstances where the safety of a child or the person accompanying him or her to court is endangered.

11.32 The risks of a child or social worker being killed in a car accident as a result of the behaviour of a child being transported or a child coming to harm as a result of absconding are too horrific to contemplate.

11.33 The compromise would seem to be that where the optimum position — namely, the attendance of the child at court — is not possible due to exceptional circumstances, provision should be made for some or all of the child’s legal team and, if necessary, the GAL and social workers to be present with the child at Lakewood while the video link is running, thus enabling the district judge and lay members to remain in their court.

11.34 This would require all the other relevant parties to attend at Lakewood, save for the judge and the lay members. This would avoid the necessity of having to relocate to Lakewood and a complete disruption of the normal court list.

11.35 The judge will always have discretion to order the attendance of the child, after hearing appropriate submissions to that effect, in light of any of the objections raised above. Live link hearings are the norm in bail applications in youth justice cases, where the liberty of the subject and right to a public hearing are similarly at large. Moreover, the public interest, the safety of the children who might abscond, the safety of social workers taking these children to court and the public purse all favour this step.

11.36 However, any such recommendation would not only require legislative change but need to address the requirement for counsel to consult with their clients. Any proposal for video link should include a discrete provision for funding specifically for consultations to be sourced. It does not appear under present suggested funding schemes that any provision will be made for additional visits to Lakewod. Moreover, it would be totally dependent on there being a reliable, effective live link between Lakewood and the court.

Responses

11.37 There continues to exist a difference in opinion on the reform that we suggest in this matter. Provided the proposed amendment to art. 44 of The Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995 is used only in exceptional circumstances, most responses were in favour. This included, for example, the Law Society, the Belfast Solicitors’ Association, the Northern Ireland Guardian Ad Litem Agency, the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, the Health and Social Care Board, the Belfast Health and Social Care Trust, and the Northern Ireland Lay Magistrates’ Association (although an extremely distinguished ex-lay magistrate, Dr W G McCarney, was opposed to it, believing that, in exceptional circumstances, the courts should sit in Lakewood). Strong voices were raised against the proposal by Women’s Aid, VOYPIC (Voice of Young People in Care) and the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Children and Young People emphasising rights under art. 12 of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child to be heard and the fear that use of live links could diminish the right of the child to be able to express themselves to the court.

11.38 Given our consideration that live link would be employed only in exceptional circumstances where, for example, the safety of the child or his carer would be endangered and therefore used very sparingly, we are satisfied that the majority of those in favour of such a move are correct and the proposal should go forward.

Recommendations

1. Art. 44 of The Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995 and regulations made under art. 44 to be amended to empower a judge to direct that, in exceptional circumstances, where it is deemed to be in the interests of the child or public safety, the child’s attendance at a secure accommodation order hearing shall be secured by way of live link to the institution where they are then being held. [FJ94]

2. As this would be a change in policy and require legislative change, the relevant department first to consult with young people, families, legal representatives and others on proposals. [FJ95]
3. The specific circumstances in which live link is to be used to be clearly identified, including agreed principles and considerations of risk. [FJ96]
Problem-solving courts

Current position

12.1 Problem-solving courts are centred on a holistic approach, with a view to balancing accountability and helping with the overall aim of promoting individual and social change. They have been operating successfully for a number of years in other jurisdictions, such as Scotland, England and Wales, and the USA, but are a relatively new concept in Northern Ireland.

12.2 The Department of Justice (DoJ) commissioned a scoping study in 2014 on the use of problem-solving courts. A scoping paper produced in August 2014 recommended the establishment of problem-solving courts to address the causes of specific types of offending behaviours. The Department of Finance and Personnel subsequently commissioned the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) to conduct a public governance review of Northern Ireland in 2015. As part of this exercise, the OECD carried out five case studies, one being problem-solving justice in Northern Ireland. The OECD report, Northern Ireland (United Kingdom): Implementing Joined-up Governance for a Common Purpose, was published on 6 July 2016 and it stated: ‘interagency collaboration and judicial authority are key determinants of a successful problem-justice initiative leading to positive outcomes in the justice system. More specifically, creative partnerships, a team approach and judicial interaction generate an informed decision-making process on the circumstances of the case leading to positive victim-focused outcomes.’

12.3 The concept of problem-solving courts was supported by the Committee for Justice in the report of its innovation seminars published on 8 March 2016, which included the following as one of its key findings:

The Committee is of the view that the underlying problems and root causes of offending behaviour in a range of areas such as alcohol and drug addiction must be tackled if reoffending rates are to be addressed; and believes that there is merit in exploring the introduction of problem-solving justice in Northern Ireland as an innovative and effective approach to the criminal justice system, particularly against a backdrop of increased pressure in the public sector.

12.4 Although this finding referred specifically to the criminal justice system, the report went on to recommend that criminal and civil cases should be dealt with together when they involved domestic violence. The report also recommended that ‘a pilot project of a problem-solving court solution’ should be one of the commitments included in the next Programme for Government (PfG). The committee noted that the problem-solving approach was proven to reduce offending, rectify perceptions of inequality, increase public trust in the justice system and reduce the number of people going to prison.

12.5 The DoJ has since committed to leading on a problem-solving justice pathfinder project under the draft PfG, which is intended to trial the concept of the outcomes-based accountability approach to delivering the PfG indicators. Although the PfG has not yet been finalised, we understand that the DoJ is minded to proceed on the basis of the approach that had been embraced by the Northern Ireland Executive and taking on board the recommendations made in our draft Report.

12.6 The PfG pathfinder project has led to the DoJ developing new problem-solving courts pilots:

- a family drugs and alcohol court (FDAC) in the Family Proceedings Court tier;
- a substance misuse court (SMC) in the magistrates' criminal court tier; and
- the enhancement of an existing pilot to create a domestic violence court.

CURRENT POSITION

12.7 The problem-solving court model is currently in operation to a limited extent in the form of the Domestic Violence Listing Arrangement (DVLA) pilot in Londonderry. The pilot, which has been led by District Judge Barney McElholm, has been developed and implemented in conjunction with Women’s Aid, Victim Support NI and other partner organisations. In a powerful speech in September 2014, Judge McElholm made a very strong argument for this pilot scheme, which is widely regarded as having improved the court experience for victims of domestic violence and abuse.

12.8 The specialist court listing arrangements have been operating since November 2011. At the first appearance in the court list, the prosecutor flags up to the district judge that the alleged offence is one of domestic violence or abuse. Once that is established, any adjournment is into one of the domestic violence review courts. Eventually, once the matter is ready to be fixed for a contested hearing, it is listed into the special domestic violence contest days.

12.9 Contested cases are clustered into each second and fifth Tuesday. No other cases are listed for those days. This helps to reduce the number of people attending court, thus maintaining a less oppressive and intimidating atmosphere. It also allows the other agencies involved to concentrate their efforts and resources into those days.

12.10 The Public Prosecution Service (PPS) provides a specially trained prosecutor on these days. Foyle Women’s Aid and Victim Support NI also liaise to mentor and support victims and prosecution witnesses. Victim Support provides a range of support services, including a pre-trial court visit, information about court procedures, and a separate, safe waiting room away from public areas. The Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service provides a separate entrance for victims to avoid their having to come into contact with the defendant or defence witnesses.

12.11 Prior to the contested hearing, all adjournments or reviews are listed into a domestic violence review court on each first and third Wednesday. These review courts aim to employ some of the elements of the fast-track specialist domestic violence courts used in some areas of England and Wales. The intention is to proceed to list contests as early as possible. It is generally accepted that the entire prosecution process is extremely traumatic for victims. They are under constant pressure, internal and external, to drop the charges and withdraw their cooperation. A common tactic employed by perpetrators is to try to delay the final hearing of the case or cause endless adjournments. If the process is too long and drawn out, the victim is less likely to continue to participate. The purpose of the review court is to focus PPS and judicial attention on eliminating all unnecessary delay.

12.12 The DVLA pilot, in the main, concentrates on facilitating the work of other groups and agencies with one common aim: to support victims and give them confidence to attend court and give evidence.

DISCUSSION

12.13 Although the DVLA pilot has been an extremely positive initiative, Judge McElholm highlighted the continuing high level of attrition in domestic violence cases, which suggests that support for victims of such abuse needs to be made available at an earlier stage. Prior to the commencement of the pilot in November 2011, 52% of cases did not proceed due to the withdrawal of the victim’s cooperation, and by July 2014 the corresponding rate was 46%, even with an improved package of support in place for victims. He also highlighted the need for a protocol to ensure clarity among both statutory and non-statutory service providers on their respective roles and for a new intensive court-supervised perpetrator programme.

12.14 The OECD viewed the court listing arrangement as an example of local justice innovation in action, and it commended the approach being taken, saying, ‘Overall the current DVLA experience provides a strong foundation for the Government of Northern Ireland to celebrate the success of the current initiative, strengthen it and explore the possibilities of replicating it in Belfast and with regard to other pressing social challenges in the country.’ However, the OECD concluded that the DVLA is not yet a specialist domestic violence court in that it does not include judicial supervision of offenders and there is no bespoke programme for perpetrators.

12.15 The Department of Justice has been keen to see the DVLA approach rolled out to other parts of Northern Ireland. However, in response to proposals from the Lord Chief Justice, it agreed that further work should be undertaken to enhance the existing arrangement before it is extended to other geographical areas. A pilot court-supervised domestic violence perpetrator programme will, therefore, be introduced in Londonderry magistrates’ court in 2017 for a cohort of between 25 and 30 perpetrators. This will be led by Judge McElholm and supported by the Probation Board for Northern Ireland (PBNJ), which will oversee programme delivery.

12.16 The focus of attention for the present is on criminal cases but there is scope to bring civil matters within the purview of a domestic violence court in due course, which could encompass the use of domestic violence protection orders and other civil orders that are designed to protect those who are vulnerable to abuse. Domestic violence is a major societal problem, which extends into many aspects of family life. During 2014–15, 28,287 incidents with a domestic motivation were reported to the police, who on average responded to a domestic incident every 19 minutes. The United Nations Children’s Fund (UNICEF) research released in 2006, showing per capita incidence, indicated that there were up to 32,000 children and young people living with domestic violence in Northern Ireland.

12.17 We support the idea, therefore, that the excellent work that has already been undertaken in Londonderry should be further enhanced, with a view to developing the DVLA into a fully fledged problem-solving domestic violence court and extending such an approach to other geographical areas within Northern Ireland.

Family drug and alcohol court

CURRENT POSITION

12.18 The DoJ, along with the Department of Health (DoH), is actively considering a pilot drug and alcohol court.

12.19 A Family Drug and Alcohol Court is already operating in England. The FDAC is a court process for parents involved in public law proceedings when the impetus for intervention is substance abuse. Parents are given the option to engage with the service. The court has a specialist multidisciplinary team attached to it containing a number of experts relevant to parental substance misuse. The judge holds fortnightly meetings with the parents and the team in the absence of the legal representatives. A problem-solving and less adversarial approach is taken. The court provides a forum for capacity to change to be demonstrated.

12.20 The assigned judge essentially manages the multidisciplinary team and programme of work for the parents. They have at their disposal an intense substances misuse package from the multidisciplinary team, which works closely with and coordinates outside agencies that provide relevant services. A tailor-made plan is put together for each individual. The first two reviews in England under the Children Act 1989 are attended by legal representatives and, thereafter, the fortnightly attendances are without legal representation unless it is required for a specific issue.

The court will order disclosure of all papers to the specialist team, which has a two-week assessment period. After three weeks, there is a second review, for which an assessment report and proposed intervention plan is filed by the specialist team. If everyone is in agreement — in particular, the parent — they sign the plan. Thereafter, the fortnightly reviews commence. There is no legal aid for legal representation at these. Any contested issues, such as contact, are listed for a hearing, and the legal representatives attend. Cases proceed to a final hearing in the ordinary way and there is an option to leave the scheme.

12.22 Research commissioned by the Nuffield Foundation has confirmed that parents who were offered the opportunity to work with the court and the specialist multidisciplinary team were more likely to stop substance abuse in comparison with the control group used — 40% of mothers did so compared with 25% in the control group, and 25% of fathers compared with 5% of the control group — and the rate of reunification and stopping substance abuse was also higher than in the control group: 35% of mothers achieved this compared with 19% in the control group.

12.23 Professor Judith Harwin, formerly of Brunel University, funded by the Nuffield Foundation to evaluate the pilot family drug and alcohol court, found that parents were offered more help in the FDAC than in the conventional court system, with 95% of mothers being offered substance misuse services compared with 55% in the control group. The quality of the programme was identified as a benefit, with the frequency and intensity, regular testing, motivating approach and therapeutic support being key factors.

12.24 The process was, in the event, no quicker than traditional proceedings, and some concern was raised about how this court model could fit with the timescale suggested for care proceedings in England, which is 26 weeks. Children took longer to be rehabilitated to parents than the comparison sample. However, the process raises issues about how the tension between reducing delay and dealing with parental problems, which require some time to address, can be achieved. It is not the view of the profession within Northern Ireland that our system requires a mandatory time limit for the very reason illustrated in these cases: each set of circumstances needs to be tailored to the individual needs.

12.25 The President of the Family Division in England and Wales, Sir James Munby, expressed his views about this FDAC model in the following terms:

4 The Nuffield Foundation is a charitable trust established in 1943 by William Morris, Lord Nuffield, the founder of Morris Motors Ltd. It aims to improve social well-being by funding research and innovation projects in education and social policy and building research capacity in science and social science.

I consider FDAC as one of the most important and innovative developments in public law in decades.

I am a strong supporter and believe that its combination of therapy, offered by the multi-disciplinary team, and adjudication and direction using the authority of the court is the right approach for parents suffering from addiction.

The process delivers better outcomes for the children and the parents subject to it and achieves this in a manner which respects the humanity of the parents.9

12.26 The benefit of having a tailored, multidisciplinary team supervised by the court and specifically constructed to deal with a particular problem — substance abuse — is one of the standout issues of this model. Providing clients with access to the services they need, obtaining funding for those services and engaging experts are areas most practitioners would describe as frustrating and a cause of delay. In this model, they have those services, tailored to their needs and instantly accessible. Obviously, the funding and cooperation of the health and social care trusts would be necessary for this and liaison with them in terms of the costs, availability and willingness to provide services would be required.

12.27 The system in London offered modest costs savings (£682 per family) but much greater savings in terms of the shorter care placements (£4,000 per child) and savings on experts (£1,200 per case). The cost of the team per family is £12,000.10

DISCUSSION

12.28 Improving the chances for parents struggling with addiction needs a fresh approach. Whilst we have no statistics for the family justice system, the experience of family judges is that it is often a core problem, especially in public law cases. In the criminal justice sphere, 74% of PBNI clients present with alcohol and/or drug addictions, and 65% of prison inmates report that alcohol or drug use has caused their problems and contributed to their offending.

12.29 If consideration were being given to targeting parental substance misuse within Northern Ireland, perhaps an English FDAC could provide a template from which to work on something tailored to the specific patterns of substance misuse encountered in Northern Ireland since, for example, street drugs may represent less of an issue than alcohol or prescription drugs. Research would need to be conducted within Northern Ireland to identify the specific areas of need in relation to substance misuse.

12.30 The Centre for Effective Services has conducted research on the FDAC. Its brief was to provide an overview of the English evaluation, an examination of the synthesis with the Northern Ireland system and an assessment of the costs of introduction in Northern Ireland. We await its outcome.

9 http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/uk-31512532
12.31 Again, this is an area where there is scope to bring criminal and civil justice responsibilities together in order to provide a more joined-up service to the citizen. We regard a family drug and alcohol court pilot and a substance misuse court pilot (see below) as complementary and would encourage the DoJ to progress work on each in parallel, so as to maximise the benefits of such an approach for the families most severely impacted by substance abuse.

12.32 We recently came into possession of a document published by the FDAC National Unit, which is a voluntary group funded by the Government. Retired District Judge Nick Crichton, who is the founder of FDAC and lead for judicial training, is a member of this unit and has been of inestimable assistance to us in Northern Ireland in attempting to set up an FDAC problem-solving court.

12.33 The FDAC National Unit provided figures dealing with the immediate and long-term savings arising from such a problem-solving court. It estimates that the FDAC keeping more children with their families saves public money that would otherwise be spent on taking children into care at a cost of £17,220 each per year. Families who appear in the FDAC are less likely to return to court, and it therefore saves money on future court costs, estimated at £2,100 on average per case. More parents in the FDAC overcome their drug and alcohol addictions, creating savings for the National Health Service due to reduced long-term need to provide drug treatment and to the criminal justice system due to reduced drug-related crime, estimated at £5,300 on average per case.

12.34 The same publication indicates that, across the 2014–15 caseload, the London FDAC worked with 46 families at a cost of £560,000 (in respect of specialist staff, salaries, office costs etc.) and generated estimated gross savings of £1.29 million to public-sector bodies over five years. The FDAC provided a number of figures relevant to the cost savings of such a problem-solving court.

Substance misuse court

12.35 A substance misuse court pilot scheme for adult defendants is scheduled to commence in 2017 in Laganside Courts in Belfast at magistrates’ criminal court level. The SMC is aimed at reducing recidivism and substance abuse or dependency among participants and facilitating their rehabilitation. The objective links with indicator 39 (reduce reoffending) of the draft PfG.

12.36 The SMC is at the design stage but it is anticipated that the court will place defendants who meet specific criteria on to a mid- to long-term treatment programme to be overseen by the court and a multidisciplinary supervisory and assessment team. The programme will not only deal with medical issues but explore a defendant’s social circumstances, which may contain factors predating their abuse.

12.37 There is a wealth of research material on addiction courts or drugs courts, as they are more commonly known, which have been in existence since the early 1980s in the USA and now extend to some 16 countries worldwide. Health professionals in Northern Ireland felt that associating a defendant with an ‘addiction’ and ‘drugs’ would be detrimental to defendant engagement. The term ‘substance misuse’ is considered by them to be more therapeutic, which demonstrates the paradigm shift away from the traditional adversarial role of the court the initiative requires to be successful.

One family one court

12.38 The concept that emerged during discussions in the course of this Review was that of ‘one family one court’. This would involve one designated judge hearing all the various manifestations of problems arising from one family including, for example, the care proceedings, contacts, applications, residence orders, divorce, ancillary relief, bankruptcy or possession of the family home proceedings, and the criminal aspects arising from matters such as domestic violence.

12.39 This idea has been the subject of discussion for some years now. Whilst notionally it has a sound foundation in theory, the practical problems to be surmounted have, to date, overwhelmed it. How could the same judge hear the criminal aspects of the family relationship when they should in most instances be unaware of previous convictions or of prejudicial material? Would the one judge have expertise in all the various areas of law that might arise?

12.40 We consider that it is a concept eminently worthy of further research and consideration. It would be a rewarding topic for a subcommittee set up by the proposed new Family Justice Board to explore and investigate.

Recommendations

1. Problem-solving courts to be established in Northern Ireland as a means of reducing the societal harm caused by domestic violence and abuse and by substance misuse. [FJ97]

2. The domestic violence listing arrangement pilot in Londonderry to be enhanced, initially to improve support for victims and provide for court-supervised offender programmes and, thereafter, to encompass civil proceedings. [FJ98]

3. Consideration to be urgently given to establishing a new family drug and alcohol court, based on the English model, initially as a pilot scheme, in parallel with the development of the planned substance misuse court pilot. [FJ99]

Child abduction

Current position

13.1 The term ‘child abduction’ covers a number of situations, some of which are relevant to this Review.

There are criminal offences associated with kidnapping/abduction, which are beyond the remit of the Review. There are also:

- international abductions between countries that are signatories to the Hague convention;\(^1\)
- international abductions involving non-Hague convention countries;
- abductions within the European Union that involve consideration of the Brussels II regulation;\(^2\) and
- abductions within the United Kingdom.

13.2 The Central Authority records that, as of November 2015, it had received a total of 22 incoming and outgoing applications in respect of children abducted or wrongfully removed under the provisions of the 1980 Hague convention and Brussels IIa.\(^3\) Nine of these were incoming and 13 were outgoing.

13.3 The Central Authority received a total of 31 applications in 2014 under the 1980 and 1996 Hague conventions and Brussels IIa. Overall, there was a total of 17 incoming and outgoing applications received under the provisions of the 1980 Hague convention. Four were outgoing applications from Northern Ireland in respect of children abducted out of the United Kingdom in 2014 and 13 were incoming cases in respect of children abducted from a convention country and brought to Northern Ireland.

13.4 The Child Abduction and Custody Act 1985 came into force on 1 August 1986, implementing two international conventions: the Hague convention protecting

\(^1\) The principal object of this convention, aside from protecting rights of access to children, is to protect children from the harmful effects of cross-border abduction and unlawful retentions by providing a procedure designed to bring about the prompt return of said children to the state of their habitual residence. It is based on a presumption that, save in exceptional circumstances, the wrongful removal or retention of a child across international boundaries is not in the interests of the child and ensures that any determination of the case of custody or access is made by the most appropriate court, having regard to the likely availability of relevant evidence. The principle of prompt return serves as a deterrent to abduction and wrongful removals.

\(^2\) Council Regulation (EC) 2201/2003 of 27 November 2003, also called the new Brussels II, Brussels IIa or Brussels II bis, is a European Union regulation on conflict of law issues in family law between member states — in particular, those related to divorce, child custody and international child abduction. The regulation concerns the jurisdiction responsible for parental responsibility, including the other parent’s access to the child. Jurisdiction is generally referred to the courts connected to the child’s habitual residence. The regulation also specifies procedures regarding international child abduction but does not take precedence over the Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction, to which all EU member states are party.

rights of custody, which is broadly defined and now includes inchoate rights of custody; and the European convention, which seeks to facilitate, recognise and enforce decisions regarding custody.

Child abduction between convention countries

DISCUSSION

13.5 It would be impossible to cover all of the issues that have arisen through development of the jurisprudence in this area. However, a number of pertinent examples are raised for comment as follows, as these appear to have the most bearing upon practice and procedure. They should be seen against a background in Northern Ireland where we start with a considerable advantage in that there is a concentration of decision-making, with one judge dealing with Hague convention cases in one courthouse and that judge is the liaison judge. There is a problem in other jurisdictions where that does not occur.

13.6 These are summary proceedings and must conventionally be heard and determined within six weeks.

13.7 The complexion of Hague cases has changed from the typical case of the non-custodial parent snatching a child to the situation of the custodial parent fleeing with a child from oppressive situations, such as domestic violence.

13.8 While welfare is specially excluded from any Hague consideration, the practical difficulties for the practitioner in keeping to this and following the strictures are well illustrated in Re E (Children).4

13.9 How the voice of the child can be heard in Hague cases, given that the perspective of children has now been deemed relevant not just to the defence of wishes and feelings but to other issues such as habitual residence in Re LC (Children)5 is a real challenge.

13.10 Judicial liaison is a key component in many instances and can be very effective. Is it utilised enough and in what circumstances can it assist with practice?

13.11 Undertakings are frequently used in Hague proceedings, but are they effective and are they enforceable in the country hearing the case and the country of return? What are the penalties for breach?

13.12 Pending the hearing and resolution of Hague cases, should there be a greater emphasis on contact arrangements for the ‘left behind’ parent, and how can these be enforced? Should there be greater use of mediation in Hague cases and, if so, how can that be achieved?

13.13 Should children have separate representation in Hague cases and, if so, in what circumstances?

13.14 When, if ever, should inherent jurisdiction be used alongside Hague proceedings?

13.16 In what situations should oral evidence be taken?

13.17 There seem to be two categories to consider regarding any recommendations this Review can make. The first is procedural, and in this regard good practice is already in place, particularly in relation to dealing with Hague Convention cases within the recommended time frame. It is suggested that a protocol may assist in this, with provision for a written statement of reasons why the parents in a particular case cannot comply. The judicial liaison machinery is well developed in Northern Ireland in that there is a designated judicial liaison judge who can direct — and has directed — judicial liaison at short notice. This has been effectively used within our jurisdiction and, as the infrastructure is in place, this Review simply commends the ongoing use of such a system.

13.18 We also consider that these cases need to be prioritised (as indeed they are currently), and we would support a practice of taking other cases out of the list to accommodate a hearing in cases of this type. A specific change in the court rules should be considered so that the period for lodging an appeal in such cases is shortened. A former family judge had a practice to direct that the period for appeal was often reduced to one week. Where there is an international obligation to have the entire process concluded, including an appeal, within six weeks, it seems that the approach in our rules to allow the ordinary period for deciding whether or not to appeal is inappropriate. Preferably, this would be by way of a rule change rather than by a protocol. Detailed consideration would need to be given by the rules committee as to whether it would require a statutory amendment.

13.19 A coexisting requirement by way of a specific rule would be that, if there is an appeal, the appellant must within a matter of one or two days bring a review application before the Court of Appeal so that directions can be given as to the preparation for the appeal and its listing.

13.20 A crucial ingredient in speeding up a properly informed hearing of such cases is to obtain at the earliest date, from Northern Ireland and from the other country involved, all relevant records. These records should be obtained in anticipation of an argument rather than in response to the formulation of such an argument. Central authorities should be encouraged to initiate the gathering of documents from the very first indication that there are to be proceedings rather than bringing the proceedings and having a judge direct that the documents are to be obtained. This can and should be facilitated by directions at reviews and by judicial liaison.

13.21 The thorny problem of ensuring undertakings given in Northern Ireland by either or both parties are properly enforced in the other country, with the possibility of mirror orders — concepts facilitated by judicial liaison — would be immeasurably assisted if all the documents from Northern Ireland could then be sent to the foreign country so that it knew what had occurred here and what, if any, were the risks involved.

13.22 There should be an obligation on the Central Authority to bring proceedings within a defined time period. A number of cases have occurred in which the courts dealt with the litigation promptly once commenced but where the Central Authority or authorities did not bring the proceedings in timely fashion.

13.23 Particular scrutiny of how the child’s voice is heard must be considered, together with the form that any representation should take. This should be at an early pretrial review. We recommend that separate representation for children is not automatic, particularly in the case of young children. Moreover, consideration should be given in cases where the wishes and feelings of older children are at issue as to how the views can be considered. In 2015, Lady Hale delivered an address on this topic and, generally in this area, some guidelines may assist practitioners. However, these need to be constructed after a multidisciplinary overview.

13.24 The Court of Appeal in England gave a leading judgment on this issue in 2014. In that case, having reviewed all the recent authorities in the matter, the court drew together a number of themes that are common to each of the authorities as follows:

- There is a presumption that a child will be heard during Hague convention proceedings unless this appears inappropriate.
- In this context, ‘hearing’ the child involves listening to the child’s point of view and hearing what they have to say.
- The means of conveying a child’s views to the court must be independent of the abducting parent.
- There are three possible channels through which a child might be heard: a report by a Children and Family Court Advisory and Support Service (CAFCASS) officer or other professional; a face-to-face interview with a judge; or the child being afforded full party status with legal representation.
- In most cases, an interview with a child by a specialist CAFCASS officer will suffice but, in other cases, especially where the child has asked to see the judge, it may also be necessary for the judge to meet the child. In only a few cases will legal representation be necessary.

10 CAFCASS is a public body in England and Wales that performs the functions of the Guardian Ad Litem Agency in this jurisdiction. CAFCASS is independent of the courts, social services, education and health authorities and all similar agencies. It looks after the interests of children involved in family court proceedings. Officers advise the courts on what they consider to be in the best interests of individual children.
• Where a meeting takes place, it is an opportunity for the judge to hear what the child may wish to say and for the child to hear the judge explain the nature of the process and, in particular, why, despite hearing what the child may say, the court’s order may direct a different outcome.

• A meeting between judge and child may be appropriate when the child is asking to meet the judge, but there will also be cases where the judge, of his or her own motion, should attempt to engage the child in the process.

• The judicial meeting should not be used for the purpose of obtaining evidence from the child or going beyond the important task of simply hearing from the child that which they may wish to volunteer to the judge. The judge’s role should be largely that of a passive recipient of whatever communication the young person wishes to transmit. Since the purpose of the meeting is not to obtain evidence, the judge should not probe or seek to test whatever it is that the child wishes to say.

13.25 We share the views expressed in this judgment, substituting the Official Solicitor for the English CAFCASS. If the child volunteers evidence that would or might be relevant to the outcome of the proceedings, the judge should report back to the parties and determine whether and, if so, how that evidence should be adduced.

13.26 In terms of practice, this Review considered that, notwithstanding the summary nature of Hague proceedings, welfare issues do arise, particularly interim contact. This is something that cannot be avoided and practitioners are usually able to resolve. However, the use of mediation in Hague cases is something that this Review considered should be encouraged to deal with interim issues, outcomes and practical issues such as undertakings and the mechanics of return. It is understood that Reunite International, a UK-based charity specialising in international parental child abduction, has provided this facility but consideration should be given to the use of specialist mediators with appropriate training in Hague-type cases in Northern Ireland in relation to this issue.

13.27 The Hague Permanent Bureau now places great emphasis on mediation and preparing for outcomes upon return. Australia has a system of specialised Hague convention mediators, who are specially trained (the Attorney-General provided for this). Their training includes understanding the Hague jurisdiction and the concept of complementary or mirror orders. They work in pairs and very often carry out three sessions in three or four days. The legal aid system meets these costs.

13.28 Directive 2008/52/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council (the EU Mediation Directive) of May 2008 is important in this matter. It must be borne in mind, however, that this is not a regulation and, as a directive, is not binding on the parties. We do recognise some concern that mediation outcomes should enjoy the benefits of cross-border recognition and enforcement, and for this to be effective there should be endorsement of quality standards common across borders. However, the Directive does anticipate that mediation outcomes will be binding and enforceable.
13.29 The Directive encourages:

- the need for identification, branding and accreditation of alternative dispute resolution (ADR) professionals;
- the need for training on cross-border issues;
- better recognition of leading mediation organisations in each country;
- compulsory attendance pre-proceedings, if directed, though not compulsory mediation; and
- powers for courts to adjourn and refer into mediation and ADR.

13.30 The Mediation Directive builds on existing Hague convention good practice. Published in July 2012, over 105 pages, the Guide to Good Practice under the Hague Convention of 25 October 1980 on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction: Mediation recognises specific challenges in child abduction cases together with the language, cultural, ethnic, religious and other differences arising. It has encouraged:

- the benefit in co-mediation models;
- the need to focus on the best interests of the child;
- the need to ensure parties are informed of the effects of abduction on the child and, therefore, focuses on the needs of children not parents;
- that the lawyer mediator must be a child abduction specialist;
- that mediation should be swift and in parallel with court;
- that the mediation agreement should be part of the court order and mirrored;
- improved contact arrangements, even where there is no settlement, and
- specialised training, the importance of hearing the voice of the child, and the need to take full account of domestic violence.

The Family Bar Association has helpfully offered to make the European Union Mediation Directive and the Guide to Good Practice Child Abduction Convention: Mediation available to the membership through the Bar Library’s library and information services.

13.31 We endorse this approach. There is a premium on well-informed expedition in dealing with these cases and early mediation with mediators who are well versed in the procedures unique to such cases is vital. This is an area where expertise in this field by the mediators will lead to meaningful and lasting decisions and outcomes in this genre. The Family Bar Association indicated that a large number of family barristers are trained mediators and are, therefore, already aware of the Directive and those who specialise in Hague convention cases are familiar with the guide to good practice. It believes that more use should be made of the high level of skill and specialisation that exists in the family Bar in both mediation and Hague convention cases whilst of course noting that funding would be required. The Law Society indicated that it would welcome identifying a list of mediators with experience in cross-border mediation — for example, through MiKK e.V. International Mediation Centre for Family Conflict and Child Abduction.

13.32 That said, whilst we are fully in favour of mediation, if the reviews drive the issues, the results should be apparent at an early stage, especially if both parents are represented and are required to put in writing what their arrangements would be if return was or was not ordered. Experience has shown that invocation of international mediation can in some instances take some time to organise. Our court processes should bring definition to the issues and make available evidence. Mediation is a concurrent method of resolving the dispute.

13.33 We add one caveat on the topic of mediation. In children’s cases generally, we encourage and help the parties to work to a resolution that reflects the best interests of the child, guided by the fact that both common law and The Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995 recognise principles such as best interests and no delay. Hague cases are arguably different. The obligation there is to return the child to the country of habitual residence as soon as possible for the ‘home’ court to sort things out for the future (save in very limited circumstances). While mediation might sometimes help to find a way through the problem, it is predicated on the basis that the primary objective of the mediation was to reach agreement on the return home rather than the whole case. Is the basis of the convention really honoured if we develop a mediation service to resolve issues beyond return of the child without the clear consent of the abandoned parent? That parent has the right to expect issues to be argued and resolved in their home country and should not be cajoled into mediation abroad, however valuable mediation is generally.

13.34 This speedy Hague process invites one further concerning thought. Parties can get caught up in litigation of this type in circumstances where periods of reflection and advice might be of greater assistance in coming to sensible conclusions. One former family judge recalled one father, to whom he paid tribute, who had a cast-iron defence to a return order but upon reflection voluntarily decided to go back to South Africa with the child, as he recognised that in the long term it was in the child’s and the wider family’s interests to have the matter resolved in South Africa.

13.35 A genuine problem arises in this area concerning the financing of the party who is in Northern Ireland. Legal aid is automatically granted to the party who is represented by the Central Authority in Hague convention and Brussels II cases. This does not apply to the party who is resisting the application and who is usually a parent in Northern Ireland.

13.36 We understand the position to be the same in both Northern Ireland and England: legal aid is not granted to the non-requesting party. The position is that the parent seeking the return automatically gets legal aid from the Northern Ireland legal aid fund in light of art. 26 of the Hague convention, which specifically precludes the applicant from being asked to pay any legal costs. That provision 13.37 The problem is that the parent in Northern Ireland has no such automatic entitlement to legal aid. They must apply for legal aid and then appeal against any refusal. Since the bar for the financial test is set so low, it is not unusual for legal aid to be refused on that ground alone.\textsuperscript{11} Given that there are so few cases every year, the cost to legal aid of allowing funding to the Northern Ireland parent is very limited.

13.38 Perhaps more importantly, the delays caused by legal aid applications and appeals make it quite impossible to meet the six-week deadline envisaged by the convention.

13.39 It is unacceptable that a parent who can hardly speak English should be obliged to conduct the defence of a child abduction case as a litigant in person, either at all or within the short time that is correctly allowed for decisions in such cases.

13.40 The question arises as to whether such a person can obtain a fair hearing in this complex field. This has been a major point that has arisen in certain of the cases determined in this jurisdiction. The clear perception amongst the profession is that delay is being engendered and thus compromising our international obligation to complete these cases within six weeks. The Legal Services Agency is simply applying the statutory criteria that have been put in place.

13.41 The statutory tests need to be revisited with the Department of Justice, particularly in light of the need to secure compliance with European Council Directive 2002/8/EC of 27 January 2003, which aims to improve access to justice in cross-border disputes by establishing minimum common rules relating to legal aid for such disputes. The response of the Family Bar Association summed this up well: ‘We believe that automatic entitlement to legal aid is essential to ensuring effective representation, prevent delay and in the long run ensure that the outcome is indeed in the best interests of the child.’

13.42 The Law Society agreed with this and considered that the training available through Lawyers in Europe on Parental Child Abduction conferences and seminars would assist Northern Ireland practitioners in accessing relevant training easily. In terms of issues of substance, this Report recommends that Northern Irish practitioners should participate in the Hague Permanent Bureau. They should make a special point of submitting any suggestions to the Hague conferences that regularly take place.

13.43 There is no reason why this jurisdiction in Northern Ireland, with substantial experience of and expertise in these cases, should not play a distinctive role in the unfolding developments in the Hague.

\textsuperscript{11} J v G [In the Matter of Q (A Child)] [2015] NIFam 1 (O’Hara J).
13.44 Further, a specialist legal group set up in Northern Ireland — comprising judiciary, family Bar representatives, Law Society and Central Authority — would be of benefit in terms of advising and updating practice and procedure. This group could consider some of the issues of substance referred to at the start of this chapter.

13.45 The Dutch have annual reports in relation to child abduction cases. In Northern Ireland, we have been collecting statistics on an annual basis. For our size of jurisdiction, and given the lack of finances available, an annual check of the statistics, with consultation with interested parties, is probably sufficient.

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. A protocol or guidance to be drawn up to ensure compliance with the recommended time frame in Hague cases and which provides for a written statement of reasons why the parents in a particular case cannot comply. A specific change in the court rules should be considered so that the period for lodging an appeal in such cases is shortened. [FJ100]

2. Greater emphasis on obtaining at the earliest date, from Northern Ireland and from the other country involved, all relevant records. Central authorities should as a priority gather documents from the very first indication that there are to be proceedings. [FJ101]

3. A protocol or guidance to be drawn up (perhaps after a multidisciplinary recommendation from the Family Justice Board12) as to how the voice of the child can be effectively considered in Hague cases. [FJ102]

4. Judges in Hague cases in every instance, at the earliest stage available, to consider the advisability of mediation with mediators who are well versed in the procedures unique to such cases. [FJ103]

5. Judges in Hague cases regularly to enquire at the outset if the legal representatives are fully conversant with the European Union Mediation Directive and with the Guide to Good Practice under the Hague Convention of 25 October 1980 on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction: Mediation. [FJ104]

6. The Directive and the guide to be part of the authority’s bundle in most if not all Hague cases. [FJ105]

7. Consideration of a specific change in the rules so that the period for lodging an appeal in such cases is shortened. [FJ106]

8. Northern Irish practitioners to participate in the Hague Permanent Bureau and should make a special point of submitting papers to the Hague conferences that regularly take place. [FJ107]

9. A specialist legal group to be set up in Northern Ireland — comprising judiciary, family Bar, Law Society and Central Authority — to advise and update practice and procedure in Hague cases. [FJ108]

International abductions involving non-Hague countries

DISCUSSION
13.46 The remedies available in these cases are limited and there are varied results in this area. The law is fairly settled following a House of Lords decision in Re J (A Child)\(^\text{13}\) whereby the principle to be applied is that it is normally in the best interests of children to have their future determined in the state of habitual residence and that the rules governing Hague are not applied by analogy. In a non-Hague case, the welfare of the child is the paramount consideration. The outcome of litigation in this area, therefore, depends on the facts of each case, with a welfare assessment in the particular country involved.

13.47 In particular, there is no reason why the analogous use of judicial liaison in Hague cases should not be invoked in these cases.

13.48 This Report notes that following a meeting of senior judiciary within the United Kingdom, the UK–Pakistan protocol\(^\text{14}\) was implemented in 2003, setting out the approach to be taken in cases involving the UK and Pakistan. This type of approach could be developed if the need arises in Northern Ireland and the use of consular assistance is to be encouraged in these cases.

13.49 However, it is noted that there is a relatively small number of these cases per year and so issues are probably best addressed on a case-by-case basis.

RESPONSES
13.50 This is a specialist area and hence in the main the responses came from the legal profession. There was almost universal approval of all the proposals made in this chapter. One area where the Bar Council raised concern was on the proposal that in every instance at the earliest stage available judges should consider the advisability of mediation with mediators who are well versed in the procedures unique to such cases. The Bar queried the degree to which mediation could be used to achieve a successful outcome in Hague convention cases with ‘potential issues around the enforcement or binding nature of outcomes across borders’. In addition, it raised the question of the time that it could take to organise international mediators and the funding necessary for this. Of course this recommendation does no more than propose that judges should consider the advisability of mediation with mediators well versed in the procedures. If particular difficulties arise in terms of delay, these can be gripped at the very early stage by the judge. Nonetheless, the potential role of mediators cannot be overlooked and needs to be addressed by judges one way or another.

13.51 The Women’s Aid Federation did respond on this issue expressing disappointment that, where domestic violence is a factor, no review of the adequacy of the current good practice guide has been recommended. Domestic violence is regularly addressed in Hague convention cases and there is sound authority for the proposition that it can play a pivotal role in providing a defence for the abducting party in certain circumstances. The law on this is cited in a number of legal authorities and it is not part of the remit of this Review to challenge or depart from those legal precedents.

RECOMMENDATIONS
1. Judicial liaison to be used in this area and we encourage that practice. [FJ110]
2. Practitioners to be encouraged to seek consular assistance. [FJ111]

Abduction within the European Union involving Brussels II

DISCUSSION
13.52 Within the European Union, the Brussels II regime applies. As such, practitioners have had to become acquainted with the provisions and various issues have arisen in practice both during Hague proceedings and after Hague orders are made. The Family Bar Association indicated that it delivers a range of training to family law practitioners and will endeavour to incorporate matters such as Brussels II into the programme of work on an ongoing basis. The family Bar is engaging in a consultation process already concerning Brussels II.

RECOMMENDATION
1. The Family Bar Association and the Law Society to take proactive steps to set up training sessions to ensure practitioners become more aware of the provisions of the Brussels II regime. [FJ112]

Abduction within the UK

13.53 This type of child abduction is governed by the Family Law Act 1986. A system is in place for registration of an order in one part of the United Kingdom that can then be enforced in another part of the UK. There is also provision for seek and find orders, police assistance and orders for disclosure. The Family Bar Association believes that further awareness of the problem of child removal within the UK is of growing concern and this should not be ignored in regards to training and funding.

13.54 The practice in this area is well established and no particular recommendations are made as part of this Report.

Additional recommendation
1. A judge to be appointed as an international liaison judge (perhaps the current serving Hague convention liaison judge) to develop already existing and new international contacts, sustain contact with family judges internationally and keep abreast of developments. [FJ113]
Current position

14.1 The spread of information technology and digital solutions across the public and private sectors over the past two decades has long formed the basis for calls for greater efficiency in judicial proceedings across the UK and in other legal jurisdictions. The fact of the matter is that most organisations and businesses now communicate material electronically and, arguably, those of us in the legal profession are the last analogue profession.

14.2 The advent of the photocopier, email, texting and our increasing propensity to communicate with each other in written form, coupled with a tendency to put everything but the kitchen sink into general disclosure in legal cases, has led to what Lord Justice Clarke described as an explosion in the production of documentary material in court that threatens to swamp the system and is an ‘enemy to understanding’. In England, Sir Brian Leveson has spoken in similar terms. In England and Wales, Sir David Norgrove’s 2011 Family Justice Review: Final Report reads as follows:

24. Current IT systems are wholly inadequate. An integrated IT system should be developed for use in the Family Justice Service and wider family justice agencies. This will need investment. In the meanwhile there should be an urgent review of how better use could be made of existing systems.

25. The Family Justice Service will also have a role in promoting continuous improvements in practice amongst family justice professionals. The Family Justice Service should develop and monitor national quality standards for system wide processes, based on local knowledge and the experiences of service users. There should be a coordinated and system wide approach to research and evaluation, supported by a dedicated research budget (amalgamated from the different bodies that currently commission research). The processes by which research is transmitted around the family justice system should also be reviewed and improved.

14.3 In a speech at the annual dinner of the Family Law Bar Association on 27 February 2015 at the Middle Temple, Sir James Munby, President of the Family Division, said:

We live in a world in which we do so much online, whether it is buying household goods, paying our bills, booking our holidays, paying our taxes … so the list goes on. But how does one issue an application in the family court? If there is still a counter, one can attend the court in order to issue, just as our ancestors did in the days of Dickens. Or one can use the post — the latest technology in 1840 but now rather dated. Or perhaps one can send an email — hardly cutting edge technology and in any event not much favoured by HMCTS unless, and most do not, you have access to secure email.
The way of the future must surely be online issue. Most steps in the process of obtaining a divorce, for example, lend themselves very easily to an entirely electronic online process. At what stages in the process is human activity required? There are only two: first, in deciding whether the pleaded facts, if true, amount, for example, to unreasonable behaviour; second, in pronouncing the decree in open court. Everything else can, in principle, be done electronically, at great savings of both time and cost. That will, I suspect, only be a start.

14.4 Every judge in Northern Ireland, particularly those engaged in family work, is familiar with innumerable lever arch files produced by the parties and cases copied several times, lined up in court, but which remain unopened or largely unrefereed to during lengthy trials. A small proportion of what is often thousands of pages of disclosed material bears some relevance to the case.

14.5 Moreover, when the files are explored, one often finds that delving into them reveals a lack of pagination — or worse still pagination that varies from party to party — an absence of chronological ordering, photocopied documents that are blurred or cut off with multiple vertical lines running down the pages, files that are not adequately labelled, papers that have poor indexing or missing pages, supplemented often by papers served at the last minute that are not contained on the judge’s papers or the opposition papers, all of which creates a nightmare for transportation or manipulation during the trial.

14.6 Courts must be able to store and process efficiently an increasingly large volume of data and information, frequently in complex civil proceedings. The collection, holding, editing and transfer of this information in the form of paper documents generate considerable expense, are time-consuming and impede flexibility and timeliness in the running of cases. It is widely accepted by the judiciary, practitioners and academics that there is a pressing need to deliver ‘mess for less’ by digitising the current system. It is time that we gripped the concept of the paperless court. The waste in terms of costs, time in preparation and presentation to court is simply unacceptable.

14.7 Resolution of the problem is not easy. Currently, many members of the profession and judiciary, particularly those of a certain vintage, declare a strong preference for documents in paper form, which facilitates underlining, highlighting, cross-referencing, commenting etc. as part of the process of ordering their thoughts.

14.8 The present system notionally facilitates an ability to move a document to another part of the file or to insert other documents in front or after it.

14.9 Many judges and professionals make their own core bundle from the mishmash of the other documents.

14.10 The proponents of the current system declare, at times with some modest justification, that witnesses are not familiar with or are uncomfortable with answering questions by reference to documents on a computer.
14.11 Counsel and solicitors, and, for that matter, the judiciary, have a strong love affair with notebooks that facilitate cross-referencing the relevant extracts on the paper in front of them and annotated points for cross-examination.

14.12 We have availed ourselves of the opportunity to discuss the paperless concept with Her Honour Judge Newton of the Manchester family court, where the concept has been effectively rolled out since 2 November 2015 in public law cases. In addition, since the publication of the preliminary report a judicial delegation from Northern Ireland has paid a study visit to see at first hand the operation of the electronic system in family cases. The judges were hugely impressed by the demonstration of the electronic court systems, including e-filing in family cases and, after having presentations and an opportunity to discuss the project with local judiciary and administrators, they were enthusiastic about the opportunity for significant improvement and change in processes and culture here in Northern Ireland.

14.13 Judge Newton described e-filing as a no-brainer. Every paper in the case in her court is passed on electronically and filed by email. It goes straight into the e-file. This is now compulsory in all public law cases and as a result has transformed the nature of paper preparation.

14.14 E-bundles have been somewhat more complex. The file is electronically handled before each hearing. It is sent to each party by the local authority. The local authority provides the bundle.

14.15 It is not expensive to set up and already there have been savings on administrative staff. In the long run, it will be necessary to have screens for witnesses in all family courts but in the interim witnesses are provided with paper bundles.

14.16 Some judges and parties, although a declining number, have not found this easy to work from and accordingly they print off the key documents.

14.17 As a result, the family court in Manchester is more or less paperless in public law. It has been found that this is a more secure system than transferring papers by couriers when the system was fully paper-controlled. It is on the government service platform. All the barristers and solicitors are on a secure address. All orders are sent out electronically.

14.18 This process is gradually being extended across the north-west of England – for example, Liverpool and Lancashire.

14.19 The legal professions have accepted it well. Previously, they had to make up their own bundles from the index provided. Now the whole bundle is provided electronically, albeit some still prepare a paper bundle.
14.20 Private law is next to be considered in this process. At the moment it is confined to public law cases. There is currently shadowing. Every private law case is set up with an e-file. Most documents arrive now by email in any event.

14.21 The e-bundles create a difficulty in England currently in private law because 80% to 90% of litigants in private law cases in England have at least one side being a personal litigant. That, of course, is not the position in Northern Ireland.

14.22 The next step after private law use is to extend it to adoption cases.

Discussion

14.23 Despite the attachment of some to the older paper system, most if not all of the practitioners and judges to whom we spoke in Northern Ireland are agreed that there must be a more accessible, efficient, less costly and technologically proficient system that reflects the digital era in which we live.

14.24 The digital revolution is already upon us in various courts inside and outside the family justice system. It is the direction of travel in every other jurisdiction with which we made contact. In the Republic of Ireland, the local authorities deliver virtually all papers online in the family justice system, although the professions are being somewhat slower to emulate this trend.¹

14.25 In England, Manchester and Nottinghamshire have used electronic bundles in care proceedings since 2014–15. Anecdotally, there remains in other areas a preference for a printed bundle. However, the local authorities will not provide this. They simply provide USB sticks with the court bundle contained in the electronic file and so counsel, and anyone else who wants a hard copy, must print it.

14.26 Outside the family justice system, the Ministry of Justice’s criminal justice strategy and action plan is committed to turning courtrooms paperless and fitting them with Wi-Fi. Great progress has been made in implementing a fully digital criminal justice system, with police adopting digital case file management and sending case files electronically to the Crown Prosecution Service, which in turn submits digital case files to magistrates’ courts. The majority of police forces in England and Wales are now transferring a vast amount of case information electronically.

14.27 The concept of the paperless court is in regular use in the family courts of New Zealand and Australia.

14.28 In all these jurisdictions, the problems we adumbrate below are being tackled or have been adequately solved.

14.29 In Northern Ireland, it is estimated that over 95% of all correspondence with the directorate of legal services family law section is now via email and email attachments. Some counsel already operate from electronic briefs. The infrastructure and basic IT skills required for the use of electronic bundles is already widely available throughout the legal profession. Since April 2016 court staff no longer issue family court orders by email or post to the legal profession. They are directed to access orders via ICOS. However, orders will continue to be issued to the Police Service of Northern Ireland, the Probation Board for Northern Ireland and personal litigants or when directed by the court.

14.30 The Historical Institutional Abuse Inquiry in Banbridge under the chairmanship of Sir Anthony Hart used a wider scope system, whereby the information was logged on to a central network established and maintained by the Executive Office via IT Assist. Each individual user was given an electronic key to access information, including court bundles relating to the case. In this inquiry, the Executive Office via IT Assist was responsible for the running of the system, which included the provision of IT support throughout the hearing — for example, by calling up relevant extracts from the bundle. Each party had to install the software on their own machine or borrow a laptop from IT Assist for the duration of the proceedings. The system worked well for an inquiry that lasted a lengthy period with the same parties. It may not be so manageable or cost-effective for discrete and disparate hearings.

14.31 The Saville Inquiry and the Hyponatraemia Inquiry, chaired by Mr Justice O’Hara, deployed similar technology.

Advantages of a paperless court

14.32 The advantages of developing the concept of a paperless court in keeping with the digital tech revolution are numerous. They include:

- Having vast swathes of documents on computer means reduced storage space for large files, reduced transportation costs, avoidance of the need to scan, a reduction in photocopying etc. and will inevitably turn out to be a money-saver for everyone within the family justice system.

- A judge or professional lawyer, with the benefit of documents carried in a USB stick or the like to refer to, and, where appropriate, to copy from can easily work from home or elsewhere. Documents can be securely accessed by a computer, laptop or iPad from any location with Internet access.

- The presence of documents in e-form (many of which will be in e-form in any event) permits, where appropriate, a largely screen-led trial with very few documents physically copied. The vast majority of documents in large trials are never likely to be looked at. Their presence on computer provides for the off-chance that they may become relevant. They can always be turned into hard copies if need be.

- The interminable footnotes often contained in skeleton arguments can have hyperlinks to the relevant document or transcript accessed easily by clicking them. It precludes the necessity to locate the bundle, page and passage and type out a quotation.
• Documents on computer often have greater clarity and can be enlarged. Photographs, when copied in trial bundles, often are virtually indecipherable. They can be perfectly reproduced on computer.

• An electronic file of evidence can be searched in seconds to find occurrences of anything one wants to obtain. In ancillary relief cases, for example, accounts, if available in a spreadsheet format seen in tabular form, can be filtered to find just the numbers one is looking for and can be used to produce an infinite variety of alternative schedules to illustrate whatever points you wish to establish.

• Such proposals can be implemented relatively easily. Members of the digital courts and judicial case management subcommittee visited and saw in action how such a system has been implemented in civil proceedings in the Chancery Division in London and in the Supreme Court. Digital information can be served in large and complex cases. For some years now, using media such as CDs and DVDs, such a system has been used by certain solicitors. A future development may be for barristers and solicitors to sign up for secure email, which will enable the profession to communicate securely and be served with electronic bundles. Papers that are received can be saved on to computers.

Disadvantages of a paperless court

14.33 We should not be blind to some of the problems.

• Moving to new ways of working is not always easy. Overall, there appears to be a nervous resignation amongst some of the older members of the professions and judiciary rather than enthusiasm about the introduction of electronic bundles. Fear of the unknown and the inconvenience of adapting long-established ways of working can delay even the inevitable.

• For the advocate conducting a cross-examination, the limitations imposed by having access to only one, or even part of one, page of any given document at one time can be difficult to overcome. How does one compare documents side by side? The solution to this is learning to use split screens or the availability of two screens. The issue is brought into focus in the rare trials involving foreign witnesses where numerous documents are disclosed in a foreign language, since a witness will frequently want to be able to have in front of him or her both the original document and a translation. Witnesses giving evidence in a language that is not their first language may perhaps require a complete set of hard trial bundles for their use when being cross-examined.

• E-files are a simple and obvious concept that should be quickly introduced. E-bundles are a little more complex. Even though electronic trial bundle software packages may allow bundles to be annotated electronically, it is likely to take some time before advocates have sufficient familiarity with such a system for this to be adopted as a platform for cross-examination, or as a general alternative to the use of an annotated hard copy version of the trial bundle. The answer to this is early training and to introduce incrementally a fully electronic system through a ‘paper light’ system.

- Data protection and confidentiality issues, access from third parties or hackers for malicious purposes and manipulation of documents filed electronically also have to be confronted by a rigorous security system drawn up by the Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service (NICTS).

- Digitisation is predicated on ready access to and on the ability to use digital technology. Not everyone has such access and can use it readily. The House of Commons Science and Technology Committee recently referred to the ‘digital divide’, with up to 12.6 million adults in the UK lacking basic digital skills and an estimated 5.8 million never having used the Internet at all. We cannot assume that all litigants will have access to a lawyer who is available to enable such individuals to secure effective access. One way in which we can approach this is to draw from experience in other countries (such as the USA), providing digital navigators, available online, over the phone, in an office in the court buildings or over a secure live web chat platform, who could assist litigants to issue claims and find documents etc. For those who have no access to the Internet of their own, we should provide access to terminals in court buildings and other public buildings throughout the country. Access to justice should be local. In truth, however, as experience in the Northern Ireland Civil Service (NICS) has shown, if online services are incentivised — for example, by being cheaper — people will use them, if necessary with the assistance of more digital-savvy family members, friends or neighbours.²

- The logistics for implementation of an e-filing or virtual or remote court system, with presumably a portal provided by the NICTS to manage such an enterprise, may have cost implications and would require educating the parties, the legal representatives and the judiciary in its operation. However, digitisation of the courts fits in precisely with the move towards digitisation currently operating in the NICS.³ In England, the Treasury has recently made available £168 million for digitisation services in the English court system. Moreover, it is widely recognised that such investment will be a clear money saver in the medium term and is a classic example of an initiative of invest to save.

- Some of the more significant problems raised by barristers, both here and in England, relate to the inherent difficulties of relying on technology. Sometimes it just does not work, one of the laptops may not work, the USB drive is not compatible (although the trust should really make sure this is not an issue), it crashes, takes time to set up etc. The legal adviser has to control the witness bundle, which seems a rather difficult way to do things.4

14.34 We suspect these are all teething problems, which may arise in the early stages, but to be apprised now of them is to be forewarned, and we should be able to deal with them. They would be the subject of early detailed discussion with the service provider. Certainly, when we raised these issues with the service providers in the Rolls Buildings in London and the Supreme Court they were all confident they could be, and had been, obviated under the current systems in operation there.

Paper light

14.35 There may be a case for an interim stage on the way to the paperless courts: the concept of paper light. Lord Justice Clarke recently expressed the view that in a large trial you will need to have both paper and computer files. A compromise relates to the critical documents, which could operate as a small bundle of hard copy that can be observed by downloading from the computers for the benefit of the judge himself or for counsel when cross-examining. That allows the judge or counsel to move a document from the physical position to somewhere else or insert a critical document in front or after another document upon which reliance has been made. In other words, the judge would be provided with a core bundle, or could make his or her own, or add to an existing one as he or she goes along in the same way as counsel may wish to do so. Such an approach might ease us all into the inevitable move towards a paperless court by stages.

E-files

14.36 As Her Honour Judge Newton intimated to us,5 e-filing of documents is a no-brainer. It is already invoked by all the trusts and we are sure it is only a matter of time and experience before all parties avail themselves of it and courts insist on it.

14.37 The implementation of an electronic file management system, whereby all correspondence and documents are processed and retained electronically throughout the length of a case, is a natural progression.

14.38 One immediate benefit that such a practice could have in the Northern Ireland Family Division would be in the Family Proceedings Court (FPC). No bundles are used in the FPC so they would not be affected by the introduction of electronic bundles. However, case information (pleadings and reports) has to be lodged in triplicate in the FPCs (one for the presiding district judge and one each for the two lay members). The lay members have previously requested through the Children Order Advisory Committee that consideration is given to them being able to access court files before the day on which they are sitting. The introduction of an electronic file management system, whereby they have a laptop and can log on remotely and review papers in advance, could facilitate this.

E-bundles

14.39 E-bundles need separate consideration. As part of the inevitable drive towards the paperless court, we should already be recognising that in implementing electronic bundles there are two main options. First, the ‘narrow scope’ refers to a system in which the applicant provides the electronic bundle and emails this to all parties and the court. The other parties and the court office download the bundle on to their own individual laptops. Each party is responsible for preparing their case with reference to this bundle and for ensuring that the electronic information is retained safely. Each party uses their own laptop during the hearing with a separate one provided by NICITS for the witness box. No additional IT support is available during the hearing. The judges would have to locate pages in the electronic bundle themselves and the court clerk can assist witnesses as required.

14.40 The advantages of this narrow scope are substantial:

- It minimises the need for multiple computers to be provided and maintained in the courtrooms at the expense of NICITS.
- It does not require NICITS to undergo a lengthy procurement process or extend an existing contract for a specialist service.
- It does not commit NICITS or any of the other parties to a certain provider without the opportunity to test the general application to see what other practical uses may arise.
- It does not require constant IT support to be available throughout the hearing.
- It minimises the exposure to system crashes. With one linked network, if the network crashes, the entire case has to stop until it has been resolved. Using the narrow scope system, each laptop or tablet operates independently. The electronic bundle can be easily downloaded on to different laptops. It allows the parties to prepare cases on their own computers. This ability allows for familiarity and confidence building, something that may be crucial, particularly at the early stages of any pilot.
- It could be implemented quickly, being dependent upon the provision of computers for the judge and witness and the relevant training of judiciary in the use of the system.
- It is flexible enough to permit limited use of key documents in paper format — perhaps the core bundle only could be paper whilst all others, including discovery, are electronic.
- Should individual parties wish to retain and work from a hard copy, they have the ability to do so — nothing prevents parties from printing out their own hard copy from the electronic bundle.
Most of the population have their own tablet or laptop so there should not be any prejudice to personal litigants. They could require a hard copy from NICTS at the appropriate fee. Personal litigants might welcome the option to submit electronic bundles rather than paper copies as few of them have access to photocopiers.

14.41 The second possibility for implementation is the ‘wider scope’. In this system, all information is logged and a central network established and maintained by NICTS.

14.42 Each individual user is given an electronic key to access information, including court bundles relating to their particular case.

Electronic applications

14.43 We should consider extending the concept of electronic bundles for final hearing to electronic bundles for full applications. This would permit an electronic bundle to be submitted at the outset of an application. It would represent a significant advance towards a fully electronic court. This is likely to be of use in types of cases where all the information is available at the date of the application; it would have limited use in evolving litigation.

14.44 A natural progression of this is for the application to be determined without need for any party attending for an oral hearing.

14.45 Sir James Munby identified undefended divorces as an area that could lend themselves very easily to an entirely electronic online process. As noted in chapter 9, divorces and ancillary relief cases in the Netherlands can also already be dealt with in this way through the Rechtwijzer platform.

14.46 Interlocutory applications in all divisions of the High Court and in the county court would provide a fruitful field for such electronic applications. Certain C2 applications in family cases, particularly those that would have been heard on submissions only, could be decided on electronic submissions rather than oral hearings.

14.47 It also might be of use in certain judicial review matters involving family justice matters, especially leave hearings.

14.48 In a digital system, parties would potentially be able to initiate cases online, pay fees online, or attend hearings remotely either by exchange of text or videoconferencing tools from their homes (or, more likely, the offices of their legal representatives). Some of these solutions are already employed on an ad hoc basis by courts.
Virtual reality courts

14.49 Hearings in trials will, of course, continue to be held in open as they are now. Open justice is the central means by which the family justice courts are kept under scrutiny by the public.

14.50 However, that is not to say that all hearings must be held in physically accessible courtrooms. The functions of the court being exercised on each appearance are still required, but the means by which that function is exercised could, in certain types of cases, and at certain stages of each case, be managed in an alternative format that would maximise the efficient running of the case in isolation and the entire body of cases that the court processes at any given time. A number of jurisdictions have piloted and adopted a variety of schemes.

14.51 If video- or telephone-conferencing systems are available to converse across the world, there is no reason why, with suitable facilities for the public and for recording what happens, they should not be used as a mechanism for improving efficiency and avoiding needless trips to court, whether for lawyer or participant.

14.52 Certain hearings — straightforward case management hearings, some interlocutories, date fixing, reviews, explanations for various matters, adjournment applications, undefended divorces etc. — can be conducted virtually or on papers, both parties having had the opportunity to submit their argument. Well-prepared papers could be filed, and the decision ultimately left for the judge to exercise on papers or on, for example, telephonic or Skype communication.

14.53 The current system requires a court appearance in the majority of cases at the stage where any determination is being made by the court, or where case management functions are being exercised. The primary problem with this system is efficiency. From the perspective of the litigant, their solicitor and counsel, the court staff and the judiciary, attendance at court in the current manner at multiple junctures of every case is time intensive. In certain cases, the result reached at that appearance could more efficiently be achieved without a court appearance. Certain stages of cases could be managed and exercised without requiring attendance of a party’s representative before a judge or Master.

14.54 Paperless — or, in the interim, paper light — courts, teleconferencing hearings, video link evidence and examination, mediated dispute resolution systems and minimising oral presentation in favour of judicial officers making determination based on papers electronically filed are all part of the legal fabric, not only here in some cases but in countries as far apart as the USA, Australia, Poland, Brazil, India, Sri Lanka, Israel and, of course, England and Wales. The time has come for us to enthusiastically embrace these concepts.

Online dispute resolution

14.55 More radical is the prospect of conducting full legal proceedings wholly or partly upon electronic platforms across the Internet in the form of an online court service. We looked at this concept in detail in our Civil Justice Review. As appears in our chapter on private law in this Family Justice Review,6 we recommend this for no-fault divorce cases. In the chapter on ancillary relief,7 we discuss the more vexed question of extending this to instances of financial relief.

14.56 The professions, the judiciary and NICTS will all need time to accommodate themselves to these new digitisation processes. To that end, we need to hasten cautiously. It is felt that we should make a start with selected areas piloted such as Belfast (as occurred in England, for example, in Manchester) so that within 24 to 36 months all public law and private law hearings in the Family Division will be subject to the new regime. Thereafter, a review of that process should be instituted, perhaps by the newly constituted Family Justice Board8 to enable lessons to be learned from the process already implemented. That is not to say that those judges and Masters currently developing the concept on an ad hoc basis should be inhibited from continuing to do so.

Responses

14.57 The discussion and the proposals in this chapter received universal approval from every response, including the Probation Board for Northern Ireland, the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Children and Young People, the Health and Social Care Board, the Northern Ireland Lay Magistrates’ Association, VOYPIC (Voice of Young People in Care), the Northern Ireland Guardian Ad Litem Agency, the Belfast Health and Social Care Trust, the Women’s Aid Federation, the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, the Law Society and the Family Bar Association.

14.58 Naturally, cautionary words were expressed, as they were in this Review, about the need for significant investment, training, support, cybersecurity, accessibility for those who are not computer-literate and the need to ensure personal court appearances where appropriate. We recognise that these factors are all the vital prerequisites of a successful paperless system. The Family Bar Association properly indicated that funding of an appropriate system will determine the timeline and this emphasises the imperative need for government to take this matter forward in this legal system without delay.

Recommendations

1. Within 12 months from the date of this Report, the Bar Council, the Law Society and NICTS to collaborate to draw up a best practice protocol regarding e-files, electronic bundles, electronic applications and electronic file management systems. That best practice document should form the basis for the area chosen for a pilot scheme and as a basis for further dissemination.

[FJ114]

6 See chapter 6.
7 See chapter 9.
8 See chapter 20.
2. A family court centre to be thereafter selected as a pilot scheme for hearings listed from that date involving the use of e-files, narrow scope electronic bundles and virtual reality hearings in appropriate instances unless directed otherwise by the judge. That should become a key component of all case management hearings at an early stage. Within 24 to 36 months all family justice cases should use these processes. [FJ115]

3. In the Family Division, all no-fault divorce applications, unless otherwise directed by the Master or the judge, to be processed by way of online applications as soon as the relevant legislation is passed. [FJ116]

4. A full review of the use of this system in the Family Division to take place within one year of its inception — that is, within 24 months of this Report — by the Family Justice Board or such body as the Lord Chief Justice sets up to consider it. [FJ117]

5. NICoTS to take steps to ensure that all arrangements adopted now regarding e-files and electronic bundles will be compatible with any future implementation of a fuller electronic file management system, the same to be set up within two years from the date of the publication of this Report. [FJ118]

6. NICoTS to set up and service an online special support system for the benefit of non-users of the Internet. This must ensure that potential litigants who are incapable of accessing the Internet are not marginalised. [FJ119]

7. Any system of regulation for the use of electronic bundles, applications or file management systems to retain the flexibility to allow parties to transfer from the electronic administration affairs to the traditional paper form at the discretion of the Master or the judge. [FJ120]

8. Any digital filing solution to ensure the security of the data being stored and prevent unauthorised access to electronic court files. NICoTS should immediately undertake steps to ensure this protection is secured. [FJ121]

9. The Judicial Studies Board, the Bar Council and the Law Society to provide, as soon as practicable, appropriate training seminars to meet the new digitisation system. [FJ122]

10. The relevant rules committees to consider the necessary rule changes to implement this process. [FJ123]
Disclosure

Current position

15.1 The problem with excessive disclosure is that the photocopier has become a substitute for thought. The hope is that something will turn up; there is a failure of solicitors to get advice on evidence and a lack of time for judges to compel parties to get to the real issues and stick to them. The end result is that family court proceedings are often submerged in a mountain of paper, most of which is never looked at and which, in any event, contains countless duplications, out-of-order documents, lack of pagination etc.

Discussion

15.2 In February 2014, Sir James Munby, the President of the Family Division in England and Wales, had criticised lawyers for routinely ignoring the Practice Directions imposing a 350-page limit on bundles, warning that surplus court documents would be destroyed without notice if practitioners could not keep to these directions.

15.3 Sir James has now proposed introducing mandatory restrictions on the number of pages in court documents for family cases on the basis that lawyers have ignored previous calls for restraint.

15.4 In proposals published for consultation in January 2016 (see appendix 5), Sir James said he was ‘not conscious’ this has had much effect and that the time may now have come to impose page limits for certain types of documents. These are not currently regulated by practice directions. The limits would be mandatory unless the court specifically directs otherwise. Sir James proposed amending the Practice Direction to specify limits on the number of sheets of paper that specific documents should contain. The proposals include a 10-page cap on skeleton arguments, a maximum of 20 pages per witness statement and 40 pages for expert reports. He also suggested amending the rules to specify that bundles should not contain more than 10 authorities.

15.5 Sir James said the need for mandatory restrictions was highlighted by the case of Seagrove v Sullivan when a family judge removed most case documents from court after the parties’ lawyers submitted 3,500 pages of documents from 32 authorities for consideration ahead of a proposed eight-day trial. Sir James is asking for opinions on whether his proposals are desirable, and, if so, whether the length would be controlled by page count or word count and, if by page count, what figures are appropriate.

15.6 We are conscious that the care proceedings pilot project chaired by Eilís McDaniels, a senior official in the Department of Health, is looking at solutions.

15.7 We feel we should explore a practice direction along the English lines for Northern Ireland and that the judiciary at all levels must become involved in this.

15.8 This Report is a systemic approach to family justice. The chapters are but one part of an overall jigsaw. Hence, although we deal with the concept of paperless courts in chapter 14, it is relevant at this stage in the context of a single-tier system to record the helpful response we receive from the VP and the head of court management solutions in Thomson Reuters. They identified a number of areas where a digital case management system would greatly support a single-tier system in the following respects:

- it would provide a single view of cases, judges and courts/rooms available online 24 hours a day across the single family court and family centres to support the efficient management and allocation of cases to judges;
- it would allow easy transfer of cases/case information between the jurisdictions;
- it would support efficient scheduling and tracking of services provided by third parties such as court children’s officers, mediators, social workers, guardians ad litem etc., tying in with the concept of one-stop shop/problem-solving courts that we deal with in earlier chapters;
- courts can be kept abreast of compliance with orders issued by the court to flag where court intervention may be needed;
- via online portals connected to the case management system, efficient communications could be set up both in to and out from the court with other users — for example, the legal profession, social workers etc., including managing online various issues;
- it would enable users to be guided through pathways to capture information required to complete forms such as C1, C1AA, divorce applications etc., with the data flowing directly into the case management system to enable judges to make decisions on the papers where a hearing was not necessary;
- digital case files can be made available to be searched online by appropriate persons and made available for download or printing to service the paperless notion;
- it would enable standardisation and more efficient production of orders by courts and court staff avoiding the need to rekey information maintained in the case management system;
- it would provide operational staff with management information through the analysis of data in the system that would allow them to better manage resources and to free up resources from tasks previously required to manage cases in a paper-based system and redeploy those resources to assist litigants; and

- it would enable the electronic filing, via an online portal and storage of the core case documentation associated with the case data, to deliver a paper light system and provide options for integration with full e-bundling solution whether provided by the Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service or provided by the litigants/advocates.

Responses
15.9 Both branches of the legal profession wished to be involved in contributing to the development of such a future practice direction. The family division liaison committee would seem to be the appropriate vehicle for further discussion on this matter. The Family Bar Association suggested a wait-and-see approach to ascertain whether the English Practice Direction had a material impact on proceedings. Frankly, we do not see the benefit in this. There is a real problem that exists as outlined in paragraph 15.1 and the obvious solution is a practice direction along the English lines, provided, of course, there is a measure of flexibility, with the judge having the right, upon application, to make extensions.

Recommendation
1. The implementation by the Senior Family Judge of a practice direction along the English lines for Northern Ireland. [FJ124]
Voice of the child and vulnerable adults

Voice of the child

CURRENT POSITION

16.1 The Chief Justice of the Republic of Ireland, Susan Denham, said recently that the moral test of government is how that government treats those who are in the dawn of life — our children.

This moral test is moving into law at international, constitutional and national level. It is enabling those, who were all once children, to remember how to listen to a child.

She quoted Professor Dumbledore from a Harry Potter book: ‘A child’s voice, however honest and true, is meaningless to those who have forgotten how to listen.’

16.2 It is not only the child who needs to be listened to in an informed manner but other vulnerable witnesses in family proceedings, and particularly in care proceedings. How their oral testimony is to be facilitated is a key component of any justice system. Maturity, age (in the case of a child), mental health and social functioning disabilities are all matters that demand attention. The family courts arguably appear to be struggling to find their way to a scheme of suitable arrangements for vulnerable witnesses, particularly when they are children.¹

16.3 It has to be acknowledged that courts in this jurisdiction are, rightly, still feeling their way forward in order to determine how best to hear the voice of a child in all family proceedings, including where the child is the subject of an application under the Hague convention. What is, or is not, the appropriate channel through which a child is heard will differ from case to case and the manner in which the task is undertaken will depend on the developing skill and understanding of the judge and other professionals involved. In short, our collective understanding of how best to hear a young person within the court setting is developing and is still, to an extent, in its infancy. It is not our aim to say anything that may set current practice in concrete or otherwise prevent discussion, thought and further development of good practice.²

16.4 The starting point nowadays, perhaps, is reflected in art. 12 of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of Child (UNCRC):

1. States Parties shall assure to the child who is capable of forming his or her own views the right to express those views freely in all matters affecting the child, the views of the child being given due weight in accordance with the age and maturity of the child.

2. For this purpose the child shall in particular be afforded the opportunity to be heard in any judicial and administrative proceedings affecting the child, either directly, or through a representative or an appropriate body, in a manner consistent with the procedural rules of national law.

The Committee on the Rights of the Child in its general comment no. 7: implementing child rights in early childhood⁸ states that even the youngest child’s rights must be respected:

Respect for the young child’s agency — as a participant in family, community and society — is frequently overlooked, or rejected as inappropriate on the grounds of age and immaturity … The Committee wishes to emphasize that article 12 applies both to younger and to older children. As holders of rights, even the youngest children are entitled to express their views … young children are acutely sensitive to their surroundings and very rapidly acquire understanding of the people, places and routines in their lives, along with awareness of their own unique identity. They make choices and communicate their feelings, ideas and wishes in numerous ways, long before they are able to communicate through the conventions of spoken or written language.

16.5 The procedural rules in Northern Ireland, as well as in England and Wales, have left the ‘professionals’ to communicate with a child and pass on that communication to the court. It is recognised that the court will hear the thoughts and views of children through:

- adults, including their social worker;
- their parents if they are having contact with them; and
- the guardian ad litem or, in private law cases, the Official Solicitor and direct contact with the judge.

16.6 The guardian ad litem’s role is to represent a child in order to safeguard their interests. The guardian is expected to explore with the child their wishes and feelings if they are old enough to express them. Although the guardian will not necessarily agree with the child’s wishes and feelings, they are expected to pass these on to the court, including in a written report for the final hearing, because the court must have regard to the child’s wishes and feelings.

16.7 However, when the child’s evidence is being passed on by their guardian, their solicitor or even their parents, it is effective only if the adult carefully asks the right questions, properly understands what the child has said and passes it on accurately without anything crucial being lost in editing. As one of our individual respondent’s noted, expressed feelings of children can at times be unreliable — for example, in the intractable contact cases the judges have to be alive to the skills of reading between the lines when children speak.

16.8 Professor Penny Cooper, who has written widely on the subject and to whom we spoke, records that research with children in the criminal sphere reveals that conducting forensic interviews is a special skill, and training should be based on scientific proven methods. Moreover, training for interviews should be on an ongoing basis. Thus, for example, police officers who carry out interviews with children and vulnerable adults in criminal cases undergo extensive training before being allowed to conduct an achieving best evidence (ABE) interview for evidential purposes. Some of the complexity of ABE interviewing and skills needed is set out in a recent report by Queen’s University for the Department of Justice.

16.9 Children’s Hearings Scotland is worthy of note. Children have been able to attend hearings for over 40 years. Children as well as their parents must normally attend the hearings, which are actually meetings in private venues. Provision is made for the use of assistance for the vulnerable. Decisions are made about them in an atmosphere conducive to their participation and there is provision for the use of live link for the vulnerable. However, when matters are in dispute, the Scottish system still relies on adversarial cross-examination conducted by the lawyers.

16.10 We know from cases in the European Court of Human Rights that it is standard practice for children to be present for at least some of the time in children’s cases in Germany and almost invariably for the judge to speak to them.

16.11 Conventionally, under the current rules, in Northern Ireland cases almost invariably take place without the child in court.

16.12 In the past there was also a reluctance to see children in private. By and large, the assumption was that it was not the right thing to do. The traditional reasoning behind the reluctance to see children in private arose out of the following reasons:

- Seeing the child in private still precludes giving them a guarantee of confidentiality.
- The child has to be told that if a judge hears anything that might influence the decision, all the parties have to be told so that they can have a proper opportunity for dealing with it by evidence or argument.
- Skill is needed in eliciting the child’s views and in interpreting them and a short meeting with a judge might not meet these criteria.
- Judges may have little experience of direct communication with children and they may fail to see the pitfalls that a professional would see.
- It is a complicated matter meeting children. Judges would have to appreciate the depth of family background in that if a child comes from a family where you are not allowed to speak out, particularly to criticise parents’ actions or decisions, there may well be difficulty voicing the feelings to anyone, let alone a judge. If a child has been abused, they may have negative feelings about themselves, which will affect their self-esteem and confidence in their right to have a view.

- Moreover, in past years the idea that children might be live witnesses in these cases was almost unheard of. The Children Order (Northern Ireland) 1995 should have dispelled any doubts about the admissibility of hearsay evidence in non-wardship proceedings because videoed interviews could be admitted.

16.13 In Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland\(^8\) increasingly, however, there are circumstances where children of appropriate age are interviewed by the judge, principally in private law cases. The Northern Ireland Guardian Ad Litem Agency (NIGALA) has carried out an internal study as to the level of children’s participation and engagement over a six-month period and it was noted that there were significant developments in the practice of children’s engagement in the court process, which it is keen to support and develop.\(^9\) We strongly recommend that family judges obtain and read a copy of this brief but informative report. NIGALA is currently engaged in developing resources for practitioners to engage with children and young people, which are designed to address wishes and feelings, best interests, resilience factors as well as providing options and opportunities for engaging with the court process whether, for example, this be by writing to a judge or visiting the judge. At the same time NIGALA is engaging with legal professionals who are developing an agreed pro forma as a framework for judges’ engagement with children and young persons. However, we are acutely aware — perhaps too acutely — of the attendant dangers of raised expectations or misunderstanding of the role of the judge by the child, the art. 6 rights of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) of the other parties in the case and the child feeling betrayed if even the gist of what they said is revealed to the parents. Moreover, we recognise that damage to child witnesses during the giving of evidence can be a real possibility and courts must be conscious of the danger of inflicting more harm on a child than offering benefit to them by giving evidence.

16.14 Broadly, we follow the test for when a child can give evidence as a witness of fact in the family court in England and Wales, where the concept has been considered in a number of leading English authorities.\(^10\) The test set out in these authorities amounts to this: ‘When the court is considering whether a particular child should be called as a witness, the court will have to weigh two considerations: the advantages that it will bring to the determination of the truth and the damage it may do to the welfare of this or any other child.’\(^11\)

11 Re W (Children) [24].
This test has been criticised on the grounds that, when the court is considering the future plans for the child, the test does not consider the harm it may do to the child’s welfare if they do not give evidence. Not giving evidence may give rise to a child’s sense of injustice and a feeling of being unfairly excluded by a judge who is, however, prepared to hear directly from the adults, possibly including those who have caused the child significant harm.

DISCUSSION

However, the reluctance to meet with children has been increasingly questioned. Growing awareness of the UNCRC, the concepts of children’s rights generally, the advent of the Human Rights Act 1998 and a leading case in the ECHR, which held that ‘it would be going too far’ to say that the national court was always obliged to hear directly from a child. However, the expectation clearly was that both the child meeting the judge and having the up-to-date psychological report on the child would be normal practice.

Five main advantages for seeing children have emerged:

- The judge will see the child as a real person rather than as the object of other people’s disputes or concerns. These children may have a very clear idea about what they think is right.
- The court may learn more about the child’s wishes and feelings than is possible at second or third hand.
- The child will feel respected, valued and involved as long as the child is not coerced or obliged to make choices that they do not wish to make. The response from Dr W G McCarney, one of our most distinguished former lay magistrates, summed up this situation well:
  - When considering the question of positive benefit to the child, the judge should not confine him/herself to the question of whether or not it will assist the judge to come to a decision, but should consider the potential benefit of affording to the child the chance to feel that he or she has participated in the process of deciding his or her own fate and has said his or her own ‘shout’ whatever the outcome. It may provide an important memory to be carried forward into later life. More significantly, if denied, it may lead to a lasting and corrosive sense of disappointment or resentment of an unfeeling system.
- It presents an opportunity to help the child understand the rules. Just as the parents will have to obey the court order whether they agree with it or not, so will the child. Hopefully, a child who has been involved in the process may feel more inclined to comply with the decision than one who feels that they have been ignored.

• Parents too may be reassured that the court has been actively involved rather than simply stamping the professionals’ opinions.

16.18 In England in April 2010, the Family Justice Council issued guidelines for judges meeting children who are subject to family proceedings. The purpose was ‘to encourage Judges to enable children to feel more involved and connected with proceedings in which important decisions are made in their lives and to give them an opportunity to satisfy themselves that the Judge has understood their wishes and feelings and to understand the nature of the Judge’s task’. That guidance15 has been criticised on the basis that none of the considerations invites the court to consider the potential benefit to the child of knowing that they have had their day in court to give their truth about what has happened to them.

16.19 In 2014, pilot projects in Leeds and York sought to put meetings between children and the judge or magistrate on a more routine and structured footing by offering suitable children the opportunity of a meeting and providing them with information and the participant professionals with guidance. The reports from those projects suggested:

• quite a high proportion of the children were deemed unsuitable for a meeting with the judiciary, usually because of age but sometimes because of other factors;
• of those deemed suitable, quite a high proportion did not want to see the judge;
• there was only limited feedback from the children themselves but most seemed to find it positive;
• the feedback from the Children and Family Court Advisory and Support Service and practitioners was positive;
• there were some practical problems in making the arrangements, particularly with magistrates; and
• the judges welcomed more guidance about what the purpose of the meetings was.16

16.20 We consider that normalisation of the process — but not necessarily as a matter of routine — is to be recommended in appropriate cases so long as there is clarity about what the purpose is for meeting the child. It would not be helpful if the child wanted it for one purpose (to tell the judge their views) and the court offered it for a different one (to tell the child about the court). Judges must retain the flexibility to decide when it is appropriate but the normalisation of the process would serve as an impetus to the notion that it should be carefully considered throughout the hearing and certainly at the case management stage.

16.21 We emphasise, however, that the concept of normalisation does not mean it must normally happen in every instance. It simply means it will be normal to consider the possibility in every case. In short, judges should determine at an early stage whether or not it is in the child’s interest for the child to be interviewed personally by them. The child’s wishes on the matter must be a consideration. Where the decision is made not to interview directly, this should be kept under review as the case proceeds.

16.22 We recommend that every family judge should receive training and thereafter refresher courses in child development and the art of interviewing children.

16.23 A different range of issues arises in considering the role of children as witnesses of fact. The Supreme Court in 2010\(^\text{17}\) held that, where a child was making allegations against a parent, it was wrong to have a presumption against that child giving live evidence in court. The rights of all parties to a fair trial and to respect for their family lives had to be balanced against one another.

16.24 In December 2011, the Family Justice Council issued its guidelines in relation to children giving evidence in family proceedings\(^\text{18}\) and recommended:

- the court should carry out a balancing exercise between the possible advantages that the child being called would bring to the determination of the truth and the possible damage to the child’s welfare from giving evidence;
- a number of factors need to be taken into account, starting with a child’s own wishes and feelings;
- an unwilling child should rarely, if ever, be obliged to give evidence;
- alternatives to the child giving evidence at the hearing need to be considered, including the option of further questions being put to the child outside the hearing;
- once it has been determined that the child should give evidence, the court should consider the use of ‘special measures’, advanced judicial approval of any questions to be put to the child and agreement as to the proper form and limit of any questioning and the identity of the questioner; and
- ground rules should be laid down, including avoiding suggestions or leading questions including tag questions to the child, no Old Bailey-style cross-examination, avoiding restricted choice question and an assumption that the child understands the question.

16.25 Again there are two views on this matter. Requiring a child to give evidence about the abuse they have suffered could turn the proceedings that are designed to protect them into a further abuse. On the other hand, it may be seen as respecting the child as a real person with their own account to give of what has happened to them. Hearing the authentic voice of the child must, on occasions, include finding a sensible way of assessing the reliability of what they have to say. This need not mean giving the parties a free hand to cross-examine the child in whatever way they think fit. Just as a tight control is kept on the manner in which children give evidence in the criminal courts, so that should be extended to family justice cases.

16.26 A further issue arises as to whether or not a similar procedure — that is, the child giving evidence — should be adopted to ascertaining the child’s wishes and feelings as to what should happen in the future. Recently, the Court of Appeal in England\footnote{Re KP (A Child) (Abduction: Rights of Custody) [2014] EWCA Civ 554.} stated very firmly that a meeting between the judge and a child involved in abduction proceedings should not be used for the purpose of obtaining evidence.
When listening to what the child has to say (as opposed to explaining the nature of the court process), the judge should largely be a passive recipient and should certainly not seek to probe or test what the child says. Leave to appeal that case to the Supreme Court was refused.

16.27 Nonetheless, the question arises as to whether, if wishes and feelings are to become a matter of evidence, just like anything else, should children be called to give evidence far more frequently than happens at present even routinely?

16.28 The final report of the vulnerable witnesses and children working group, chaired by Mr Justice Hayden and Ms Justice Russell, published in February 2015, pointed out that ‘thousands of children and young people go through the criminal justice system [as witnesses] every year but the direct evidence of children is seldom heard or rarely available in the family courts’. It records that in 2012 in England and Wales there were 33,000 child witnesses in criminal cases.

16.29 That report has been described as a very radical document\footnote{Lady Hale, ‘Are We Nearly There Yet?’, Association of Lawyers for Children: Annual Conference, November 2015, p. 14.} that took on board the views of the Family Justice Young People’s Board. It asserted that the evidence of the wishes and feelings of children should come directly from the child themselves rather than through the mediation of professionals, and certainly not through a private meeting with the judge. Making them feel part of the proceedings and understanding how the legal process works is one thing. The report stated: ‘It is not part of the judicial function to evidence gather so the wishes and feelings expressed at the meeting cannot properly be taken into account when decision making.’\footnote{Vulnerable Witnesses and Children Working Group, headed by Mr Justice Hayden and Ms Justice Russell, Report of the Vulnerable Witnesses and Children Working Group, 2015, paras 23–4.}

16.30 If the criminal justice system has been able to develop tools for educating judges and advocates, why is it that the family justice system cannot do the same thing? Why should it not abandon its traditional reliance on hearsay and professional evidence in favour of direct evidence from the child? Perhaps the child should be the primary witness, both as to what has happened to them and as to what they want to happen in the future, providing special measures to enable them to do so.
16.31 Whilst remaining open-minded about the discretion of a judge to permit a child to be called as a witness in a case, we recommend that courts should give serious consideration in each instance to whether or not it is appropriate for the child to give evidence, and it should not be the case that the child or the alleged abuser can presume that the child will not give evidence.\(^\text{22}\)

16.32 Moreover, the family court should be given the power to adopt the so-called special measures when it thinks it appropriate for a child to give evidence. As appears later in this chapter, it should also be extended to vulnerable adults.

16.33 The working group recommended a number of new rules and practice directions, which we consider ought to be adopted in Northern Ireland. The object of these recommendations is to give prominence and emphasis to the treatment of the child and the parties in family proceedings, to emphasise the importance of the role of the child and the need to identify the necessary support and special measures for the child or vulnerable adult witnesses and/or parties from the outset of the proceedings or at the earliest opportunity.

16.34 These will include:

- An obligation to make provision for vulnerable parties and witnesses and children to assist them in improving the quality of their evidence and to participate fully in the proceedings.
- An entitlement to a party or witness in family proceedings on grounds of age, incapacity, fear or distress to obtain such assistance.
- An early case management hearing at which both the need for the child to give evidence and what assistance the child may need to give the best evidence of which they are capable should be considered.
- If the child has to give live evidence, ground rules, such as those introduced in criminal proceedings, establishing who does the questioning and about what and how, should be set.
- Preventing a party or witness from seeing the other party, the giving of evidence by live link and participating parties and witnesses being questioned with the assistance of an intermediary where necessary. There may be a slightly different timescale for such intervention from that which occurs in the criminal justice system.
- The court being empowered to direct that public funding be made available for such purposes.

16.35 An early product of our Reference Group discussions in Northern Ireland has been a potential project proposed by the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children (NSPCC), which provides the current young witness service for child witnesses in criminal proceedings, for piloting a similar service in the family court. Discussions are ongoing with the Department of Justice, as the policy lead and as funders of the existing young witness service, taking the lead. Development of this project is one of our current recommendations.

16.36 We conclude on this question of the voice of the child by reiterating what we said at the start: our understanding of these matters and how best to hear a young person within the court setting is developing and is still to an extent in its infancy. Judges must form their own views and exercise their own discretion on these issues, given the particular circumstances in each instance. However, our task is to ensure that those who consider it appropriate to meet with children and to permit them to give evidence in hearings should be empowered to do so, armed with the appropriate tools to allow this to happen effectively.

Vulnerable witnesses and special measures

Current position

16.37 The task of defining who is a vulnerable witness is, of course, a daunting one. Many of the parents and, indeed, children who appear in the family courts have difficulty exercising control of their relationships and have long-standing mental health issues often going back into childhood against the background of domestic violence, substance misuse, learning disability etc. Some of these people could be considered vulnerable in the general sense of the word. In order to give some definition to the phrase, however, the definition for vulnerable witnesses in The Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1999 and, in England and Wales, under the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999, may well provide sufficient parameters within the family justice setting, including as it does those who are:

- under 18;
- for whom the quality of their evidence ‘is likely to be diminished’ by reason of them suffering from mental health disorder within the meaning of the Mental Health Act 1983; or
- otherwise having a ‘significant impairment of intelligence and social function’ or a ‘physical disability’ or ‘physical disorder’.

16.38 Currently, there is no family court special measure legislation in Northern Ireland to assist a judge comparable with the situation in criminal law. However, there is no logical reason why in certain appropriate cases the family courts cannot sit in a criminal court with live link equipment and consider using court funds, if they are available, to pay for the services of an intermediary.

16.39 There is no research data available to us to indicate how often applications for family court special measures are made to deal with vulnerable parents or how often they are implemented.

16.40 Contrast in England, where a 2010 Practice Direction states that the court will ‘identify any special measures such as the need for access for the disabled or provision for vulnerable witnesses’.
Although there is no family justice system special measures legislation to assist the judge, the family justice system in Northern Ireland is, as matters stand, well advanced in recognising the needs of the vulnerable in other respects. The High Court\(^23\) as far back as 2006 addressed in detail the steps that need to be taken by courts in removing the barriers to the provision of appropriate support to parents, including negative or stereotypical attitudes about parents with learning disabilities. Moreover, courts already allow witness support in family proceedings — for example, it is not uncommon for volunteers from Women’s Aid to accompany witnesses in domestic violence proceedings. However, have we gone far enough?

DISCUSSION

16.42 Registered intermediary (RI) schemes have been put in place in this jurisdiction since May 2013, on a pilot basis, to assist with the provision of evidence in the Crown Court by vulnerable witnesses and defendants with communication difficulties.

16.43 Examination of a witness through an intermediary is one of the eight ‘special measures’ provided for in The Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1999 (art. 17). In considering the commencement of this special measure, it was difficult to estimate likely uptake and associated costs. The RI schemes pilot was launched in May 2013 in respect of offences that were triable only on indictment in the Crown Court sitting in Belfast, and in November 2013 the pilot was extended to all of Northern Ireland.

16.44 In response to the judiciary’s view that intermediaries should also be made available to defendants (as provided for by art. 21B(2)(a) of the 1999 Order) on the same basis as for victims and witnesses in order to ensure equality of arms, it was agreed that all vulnerable persons should be catered for by introducing parallel schemes for victims/witnesses and for suspects/defendants.

16.45 MindWise, a local mental health charity that runs the appropriate adult scheme, provides a court defendant supporter to sit with the defendant during his trial with an RI only assisting the defendant when their evidence is being given.

16.46 England and Wales and Northern Ireland are the only jurisdictions in which RIs are used, and Northern Ireland remains the only part of the world in which a scheme for defendants is in place. Scotland and the Republic of Ireland have been maintaining a watching brief and officials from the Republic have attended a number of Department of Justice events.

16.47 By the end of phase 1 of the pilot, 260 requests for an RI had been received. The majority of these were made by the police (223) and the RI assistance was mainly for victims (220). Three fifths of requests were for children under 18 years of age. In addition, three fifths of requests were in respect of sexual offences. The largest category of vulnerability was persons with a learning disability (one fifth).

The cost of providing an RI for these cases was approximately £164,000 (around £630 per case).

16.48 An evaluation of the pilot,24 between November 2014 and March 2015, found that the RI schemes were working well, particularly at police stage.

16.49 In light of the limited experience at court, it was decided to have a 12-month phase 2 pilot from 1 April 2015 with the scope extended to all cases being heard in the Crown Court. A further evaluation was undertaken in April 2016. The pilot was reported to have been going well, with 325 requests received between 1 April and 31 December 2015.

16.50 The judiciary in Northern Ireland has shown an active interest in the schemes and the Lord Chief Justice, during a keynote speech at a vulnerable witness conference hosted by the Institute of Professional Legal Studies in November 2014, stated that he fully supported the use of RIs in Northern Ireland and envisaged that they would form part of the justice system for the foreseeable future. He also called for the use of intermediaries to be considered in the civil context.

16.51 The role and availability of intermediaries could be a crucial factor in this vexed area. Intermediaries, as currently used in the criminal justice system, are neither expert witnesses nor witness support. They provide communication guidance and sit alongside the witness in the live link room (or stand/sit next to witnesses if they are giving evidence in court) in order to monitor communication and intervene to assist with communication matters. They would have a role to play in assisting family judges to hear the voice of the child and other vulnerable witnesses where, for example, the extent of their communication deficits would diminish the quality of their evidence as a witness or if they would be unable to participate effectively in proceedings as a witness giving oral evidence.

16.52 The RI’s paramount duty is to the court and they are required to be impartial. They are not, therefore, acting in the role of supporter or advocate. They do not answer on behalf of a witness or interpret what they have said, and they do not offer opinions on the truthfulness or reliability of what has been said.

16.53 The RIs carry out an assessment of the vulnerable person and provide the criminal justice practitioner with a report on their findings, together with strategies on how best to communicate with that person. The report may include, for instance, the recommended mode of communication, the extent of the person’s vocabulary and attention span, their expressive and receptive communication skills, their ability to understand temporal or spatial concepts and sequencing, and whether they are suggestible or tend to be overly compliant. The RI is then currently present during the police interview or trial to assist with any communication difficulties that may arise.

24 The evaluation report of phase 1 of the pilot can be viewed at: www.dojni.gov.uk/publications/registered-intermediary-schemes.
16.54 RIs are subject to a code of practice and code of ethics and are required to follow a procedural guidance manual. A separate oath has been devised for their use in court.

16.55 For some time in England the absence of an intermediary scheme in family cases has been criticised. Family Justice Council guidelines encourage practitioners to consider the use of intermediaries at the ‘earliest opportunity’.

16.56 In its report, Vulnerable Witnesses in Civil Proceedings, published in July 2011, the Northern Ireland Law Commission recommended that a scheme of special measures, including the use of intermediaries, be put in place on a statutory basis in relation to civil proceedings in Northern Ireland.

16.57 The principal challenge in implementing similar schemes for civil and family business is likely to be availability of resources. However, that is not the only challenge. How are we to set up a similar scheme where the state may not be a player? For example, in private law proceedings, who will facilitate the recording of evidence etc.? Hence the Law Commission recommendation in respect of intermediaries has yet to be implemented. Nonetheless, despite the problems, it cannot be plausibly denied that the civil justice system should offer similar levels of support and assistance to those offered by the criminal justice system.

16.58 The Department of Justice had indicated previously that it would be willing to allow the pool of accredited RIs that it had recruited and trained to be used for civil business (provided this did not interfere unduly with criminal business) but the cost per case would need to be funded. Since the use of RIs would be novel in this setting and would represent a cultural shift, some resources would also need to be invested in raising awareness of the particular role played by the RI.

16.59 Already, training is delivered for RIs in both Northern Ireland and England and Wales by Professor Cooper and her colleague David Wurtzel.

16.60 The question would arise as to how the additional work to be carried out by the RIs in the family pilot scheme would be funded. Since there must be some flexibility in the fund available for criminal cases, it does not seem to us that the additional figures for a pilot scheme in Belfast would be a huge increase in the sum already set aside for RIs. Wisely, however, the Health and Social Care Board (HSCB) in its response cautioned that use of RIs from the criminal courts would work only provided those RIs had the particular skills and knowledge required for working with children and families. Given that the current pool of RIs is drawn from the ranks of the social work and speech and language therapy professions, we are confident such experience should be available.

16.61 In short, RIs have potentially more of a role to play in family law, where the rules of evidence are relaxed somewhat and where welfare is the core consideration. Family justice in Northern Ireland is ahead on this issue anyway, although in an ad hoc way. We now use befrienders in court and voluntary organisations (such as Mencap and Women’s Aid) frequently come to court on sensitive issues. We advocate that family law leads the way still further in potentially creating a more formalised structure in supporting child witnesses with a better system of supports for court.

Responses

16.62 The responses to these proposals were all extremely positive. The Belfast Health and Social Care Trust’s response captured the universal tone:

   The Trust endorses the recommendations detailed in the report in relation to this central issue. Placing a child’s or vulnerable adult’s need at the centre of the judicial process will enhance a culture which recognises and promotes their right to participate and the importance of their contributions.

16.63 The Family Bar Association, Family Mediation Northern Ireland and the HSCB properly drew attention to the need to ensure that there is no duplication of services or indeed confusion in the minds of the children through seeing too many people in an attempt to ascertain the views of the child. The legal professions were anxious to see some further research into the principles surrounding participation of vulnerable witnesses and children but welcomed the prospect of a pilot scheme in the first instance. The family Bar in particular pointed out that developments in England arising from the vulnerable witnesses and children working group set up in 2014 should be closely monitored. We have no doubt that monitoring of developments elsewhere is a crucial ingredient of an active family justice system and doubtless that will travel hand in glove with our own pilot schemes.

Recommendations

1. Every family judge to receive training in the art of interviewing children and child development. [FJ125]

2. Judges to determine at an early stage whether or not it is in the child’s interest for the child to be interviewed personally by them and where the decision is made not to interview directly, this should be kept under review as the case proceeds. [FJ126]

3. The Bar Council and the Law Society to introduce guidance and specialist training for those questioning children and the vulnerable. [FJ127]

4. Family courts to be open to prerecording of evidential interviews, pre-court familiarisation, court supporters and special measures such as live link and screens. [FJ128]

5. Registered intermediaries to be introduced into the family justice system with the power of the court to appoint them. In this context, courts should consider putting the required questions to a vulnerable witness through an intermediary. This could be done by the court itself, as would be common in continental Europe.26 [FJ129]

6. As a first step, registered intermediaries to be introduced for a specific part of civil justice — namely, family justice — on a non-statutory basis. Referrals for RI assistance could be limited to cases where securing the evidence of the vulnerable witness was of particular importance for the effective conduct of court business. [FJ130]

7. This to be done administratively in the first instance using the court’s inherent powers for a pilot scheme in Belfast Family Proceedings Court and Belfast Family Care Centre, where there would be sufficient numbers to allow a proper evaluation. Whilst it would be cheaper to permit it in smaller jurisdictions — such as Craigavon, where there are fewer cases — this would diminish the evaluation process. A pilot would demonstrate that the costs are justified by the benefits — better client experiences, most effective use of court time and compliance with art. 6 and art. 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights. [FJ131]

8. The Department of Justice to explore with the NSPCC the potential for the young witness service, which currently supports child witnesses in the criminal justice system, to be extended to the family court. This should initially take the form of a pilot to identify the costs and benefits that would be associated with a full roll-out. [FJ132]

9. The formation of a Family Justice Board,27 if adopted, to take up this issue of children and vulnerable adults in the family courts, carry out further research and make further appropriate recommendations. [FJ133]

Court setting

Current position

17.1 In most family courts, no allowance is made for the unique family justice nature of the proceedings in terms of how the physical structure of the court is set up. We considered suggestions to alter the formal nature of the court setting.

17.2 There is some precedent for a much more informal setting in the youth justice context. Both the youth court and Family Proceedings Courts are constituted in the same way as juvenile courts under the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1968.

17.3 Following a series of reports from Lord Clyde (in his role as Justice Oversight Commissioner) commencing in 2003, and as a result of recommendation 11 of A Review of the Youth Justice System in Northern Ireland (September 2011), guidelines\(^1\) in relation to the operation and layout of the youth court were reissued in 2014:

In some courthouses, particularly older buildings, the structure and layout may present a challenge to providing all the facilities that are desirable for youth courts. However, the case should always be heard in a courtroom where everyone involved is on the same, or almost the same, level. Research has shown that the physical court environment — the type of furniture, layout and seating arrangements — can influence communication. It can help people to play an active part in the process or can prevent people from feeling involved.

17.4 Currently, no such provision has been made in the family courts. Should this change?

Discussion

17.5 The argument in favour of a modern approach to the court setting is that family proceedings should be conducted in what might be perceived as a more friendly and consequently less formal manner than other courts. One of our respondents, Dr W G McCarney, considered that family proceedings should be conducted in a less formal, more friendly environment than other courts. Parents and children should not be intimidated by the formality of the traditional court setting and the shift towards these courts being problem-solving fora would arguably lend itself to this change. Currently, judges and most of the profession appear without robes or wigs (although the Family Division in Northern Ireland recently reintroduced the wearing of gowns by judges) in all such courts in the UK and some rooms are set up in boardroom style with modern furnishings. A school of thought has emerged that the wearing of wigs and gowns is a retrograde step on the basis that courtrooms are intimidating places, can have a detrimental impact on children appearing there and a more informal setting of adjustments to the layout and facilities in the court can lessen the impact on children there. Consequently, it is argued that no wigs or gowns should be worn.

17.6 The argument against any change in the status quo is based on three contentions:

- First, the cases often, if not invariably, involve domestic violence or heightened emotions. We saw how matters can escalate in the Irish courts where a family judge was viciously assaulted in a court in Dublin in December 2015. There is too much of a risk if we change to a different model. One local judge spoke of an incident where a father had confided in a worried child (who fortunately asked to share something important with the Official Solicitor) an intention to mount a ‘spectacular’, which involved the death of his ex-wife and solicitor in chambers on a stated date. The incident ended when security staff (newly introduced) removed a nine-inch knife from the boot of the father before the proceedings started.

- Secondly, we consider that proceedings should reflect the seriousness of the subject matter. Often in non-accidental injury or sexual abuse cases the standard for criminal prosecution is not met and so the family court is the only court asked to make findings. These are substantial cases that involve contested evidence, including the evidence of experts. The use of the current court structure is appropriate, in our view, for such cases. The more formal the proceedings, the better it is for the judge to maintain control and proper decorum in court. Family judges in Northern Ireland are now recommencing to wear gowns as a move towards some more formality.

- Thirdly, the proposal confuses litigation with facilitated mediation or conciliation, which can be more informal but is not judge-led. We have layers of mediation involving court children’s officers etc. and a step up in formality conveys an important message. Litigants in person need to know when the negotiations stop and (potentially) adjudication begins.

17.7 The Civil Justice Review examined the possibility of changing the nomenclature of the judiciary — for example, that all judges simply be addressed as ‘Judge’ or ‘Your Honour’ in order to modernise the courts, making them less alien and intimidating. We do not discern this to be a matter of much public concern and, in any event, views expressed to us on this potential change are so split that we have decided to postpone any further consideration of it until it is reviewed, perhaps by the Family Justice Board.²

17.8 That is not to say, however, that we do not place a premium on the absolute need for the use of plain and simple language in family courts. A complaint that surfaced on our website was the image of courts where the litigants, often placed at the back of the courts, were unable to hear what was being said by the legal representatives at the front in a somewhat noisy court setting. Courts must be user-

friendly in every sense. Proceedings should be conducted in a manner and in language that fully involves all parties. The Belfast Solicitors’ Association pointed out in its response that better use of microphones and better-placed seating for litigants would assist in this area. Moreover, solicitors and barristers should recognise the obligation on them to explain the necessary use of legalese fully and properly to their clients.

17.9 We have had to the fore of our thinking throughout the need to have courts in which the public are fully involved. That should include the adjudication system in appropriate instances. Hence, we regard the participation of the lay magistracy, with its rich tapestry of experience, knowledge and community involvement, as an important part of the administration of open access to justice. They are diligent in their attendance at court and in their preparation for court in reading often many, many files (often coming apart at the seams and held together with nothing more robust than a treasury tag) and faithful in their attendance at our divisional meetings.

17.10 In the context of Northern Ireland, they provide a crucial link with and allow the involvement of the public at large in the administration of justice. Accordingly, we do not join the somewhat small chorus of voices that has called for their abolition.

17.11 One final matter: in order to lift the profile of the Family Division even higher and to emphasise the inclusive nature of this discipline, we advocate the setting up of an annual lecture — perhaps characterised as a memorial lecture for one of our esteemed past family judges — to be given by the Senior Family Judge or someone of similar distinction as to the state of our family law. To this lecture, all those involved in the family diaspora and the general public would be invited.

Responses

17.12 Interestingly, not one respondent took issue with the current use of nomenclature although the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Children and Young People and the Law Society suggested that these matters be kept under review by the Family Justice Board. This illustrates to us that, as the Belfast Solicitors’ Association pointed out, the existing forms of address for the judiciary are not a pressing concern for the public and there are more important issues to be addressed within the judicial system.

17.13 In the context of the court setting, however, concerns did surface, for example, from the Northern Ireland Lay Magistrates’ Association and the Family Bar Association about the lack of suitable consultation rooms or space for consultation/negotiations in current courts. This serves to add weight to our proposals that family justice should be centred in three or four centres where all the necessary equipment and facilities are provided, including adequate consultation rooms in order to preserve the dignity and confidentiality of the process.
Recommendations

1. No change in the current formal setting of the family courts or the nomenclature used, although this is a classic example of how the Family Justice Board could revisit the matter as time passes and experience evolves. [FJ134]

2. A renewed emphasis on the use of plain and simple language by judiciary and the legal profession in family courts. [FJ135]

3. No change in the role of the lay magistracy in the family courts. [FJ136]

4. An annual lecture on the current state of family law. [FJ137]
Open justice

Current position

18.1 There are few more difficult issues in family justice than the matter of open justice and the reporting of cases. There is a tension between concerns about ‘secret justice’ and legitimate expectations of privacy and confidentiality for the family. Both standpoints are valid and the question is whether they are irreconcilable.

18.2 The starting point for consideration of publicity in the family courts, as in all courts, is the principle of open justice. Open justice promotes the rule of law. It also promotes public confidence in the legal system. The principle has a long history, dating back to a seminal case in 1913\(^1\) wherein it was described as being at the heart of our justice system.\(^2\)

18.3 Since the enactment of the Human Rights Act 1998, the common law principle of open justice has been reinforced in different forms by art. 6 and art. 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights. It has been held that the principle of open justice is to be derogated from only to the extent that it is strictly necessary to do so.\(^3\)

18.4 Most applications in the Family Proceedings Court (FPC), the Family Care Centre (FCC) and the Family Division are heard ‘in private’ — that is, ‘in chambers’. Members of the public are not permitted to attend hearings held in private. Duly accredited members of the media are often permitted to attend hearings of family proceedings held in private in the Family Division, the FCCs and the FPCs, subject to the power to exclude them on specified grounds. This is different from hearings in camera, where neither media representatives nor members of the public can attend.

18.5 We are witnessing a particularly complex and changing landscape populated by, on the one hand, judges trying to strike a balance between what it is appropriate for the media to report or publish in cases — which, by their nature, are necessarily personal and potentially life-changing — and, on the other hand, ensuring the privacy, safety and anonymity of the parties, specifically the children and young people involved. It is a challenging task for the family justice system to strike an appropriate and fair balance between public accountability and transparency in the manner in which family cases are decided upon — ensuring that the public maintain confidence in the system and a belief that decisions are not taken by judges based on the evidence of unaccountable experts or a malicious parent — whilst equally ensuring that the best interests of children and the paramountcy of their welfare is protected.

18.6 In recent years, there has been an emerging and growing consensus that the law should be reformed to ensure greater transparency in proceedings concerning the welfare of children. We must not underestimate the role that public debate, and the jealous vigilance of an informed media, has to play in exposing past miscarriages of justice and in preventing possible future miscarriages of justice. There is a compelling and irrefutable public interest in the effective operation of family justice courts, which deal with matters of the greatest importance. In the case of Re: J (A Child), the President of the Family Division in England and Wales stated:

With the state’s abandonment of the right to impose capital sentences, orders of the kind which family judges are typically invited to make in public law proceedings are amongst the most drastic that any judge in any jurisdiction is ever empowered to make.

In 2014 he said:

One [aspect] is the right of the public to know, the need for the public to be confronted with, what is being done in its name. Nowhere is this more necessary than in relation to care and adoption cases. Such cases, by definition, involve interference, intrusion, by the state, by local authorities and by the court, into family life. In this context the arguments in favour of publicity — in favour of openness, public scrutiny and public accountability — are particularly compelling.

18.7 The workings of the family justice system in this case are matters of public interest and do merit public discussion. Public confidence in the process is necessary and the emergence of the changing circumstances of this case merits an open discussion. Recent publicity in England and Wales surrounding allegations that abusive men are being allowed to confront and cross-examine their former partners in family court hearings has led to headlines such as ‘Revealed: The Secret Abuse of Women in the Family Courts’ and ‘Revealed: How Family Courts Allow Abusers to Torment their Victims’. One article cites the facts that the cuts to legal aid and the cutbacks in the whole court estate meant the situation for vulnerable women within the family courts was getting worse …

Legal aid cuts mean increasing numbers of men and women are representing themselves in court, increasing the chance of some men being able to use the process as part of their continuing harassment, abuse and controlling behaviour.

Anecdotally, this problem is not so great in Northern Ireland simply because to date the granting of legal aid in family cases is much less restrictive. This is in itself a strong indication that those considering any changes to the current legal aid situation and family matters in Northern Ireland should strongly bear in mind the public interest in protecting spouses or partners in such cases.

18.8 However, it is also well established that there are exceptions to the general presumption of open justice and one such exception concerns proceedings relating to the welfare of children. The Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995 states that, when a court determines any question in respect to the upbringing of a child, the child’s welfare is the court’s paramount consideration. Children are not involved in these proceedings by choice. Research tells us a great deal about the potential for long-term ill effects on the health, well-being and development of children who have had troubled childhoods. Therefore, ensuring their safety and well-being during court processes does matter and that means protection from unwanted press intrusion and from the publication of intimate, painful details about their lives, which have the potential to create long-lasting or permanent damage to those who are least equipped to handle it.

18.9 It is these conflicting dynamics that command the attention of this chapter. Sadly, there has been very little research conducted in this jurisdiction on this matter. It is, therefore, ripe for debate as to what statutory reforms, practice directions or overall regulation or reform is required.

Current legal position in Northern Ireland

18.10 In matrimonial cases, generally speaking, the media can report the names and addresses of parties and outline the grounds, defences, legal points and judges’ rulings. In matrimonial finance cases, such as maintenance and property adjustment orders, and divorce, the media can usually publish names, addresses and occupation of parties and witnesses, a concise statement of the grounds of the application, defences raised, submissions on any point of law and the judgment. It cannot report what has occurred in the proceedings nor information or evidence disclosed in relation to cases by the parties orally or contained in documents filed in the court unless the court has given permission.

18.11 We can summarise the position in Northern Ireland with regard to cases involving children in family courts as follows:

- Unless the court otherwise directs, proceedings involving children in the family court shall be heard by a judge in chambers. No member of the public at large can attend as of right.
- Under art. 170(2) of the 1995 Order no person may publish to the public at large or any section of the public any material that is intended or likely to identify any child involved in any proceedings under the 1995 Order or any address or school as being that of a child involved in any proceedings.
- Any contravention is a criminal offence. This prohibition ends when the relevant proceedings are concluded, unless extended by the court.
• Under art. 89 of The Magistrates’ Courts (Northern Ireland) Order 1981, media representatives can be present during the hearings of domestic proceedings, save in those circumstances where the court exercises its powers under art. 89(3) and art. 89(4) to exclude them.

• This is not the position in the High Court or Family Care Centre courts, where the press (or members of the public) still require the permission of the judge to be present. However, judgments in the High Court in family law cases have been published, suitably anonymised, where appropriate.

• The Administration of Justice Act 1960 (s. 12) prohibits accounts being given or published of what has gone on at the hearing before the judge, contents of documents drawn up for and arising out of the hearing and transcripts or notes of the evidence or judgment. This does not apply to the publication of the text or summary of the whole or part of a court order, unless expressly prohibited by the court.

• The inherent jurisdiction of the High Court may be used to relax or to reinforce the statutory restriction on publication contained in the 1995 Order or 1960 Act.

• The legislation balances open justice and confidence in the process on the one hand and the necessary confidentiality required to protect children in an area of law where their interests are paramount.

• The prohibition on publicity and privacy at the hearing can be dispensed with under the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR), not merely if the welfare of the child requires it but when the court is required to give effect to the rights of others, and a judge must consider whether or not to exercise his discretion if requested by one of the parties, not giving pre-eminence to the claim of the child.

Position under the ECHR

18.12 Art. 8 of the ECHR provides for the right to respect to private and family life.

18.13 Art. 16 of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child provides that children have an undeniable right to have their privacy protected. Therefore, domestic jurisdictions have a clear mandate to ensure their dignity is guaranteed by not exposing their private troubles to the public ear. Concerns about sharing of information about children and young people found expression most recently in the Supreme Court7 even where the aim of Scottish legislation to appoint named persons to monitor children was manifestly clothed in an aspiration to safeguard the welfare and safety of children.

18.14 The general rule at common law, as augmented by jurisprudence under the Human Rights Act 1998, is that the administration of justice must be done in public. Art. 6.1 of the ECHR provides as follows:

7 The Christian Institute and Others v The Lord Advocate (Scotland) [2016] UKSC 51.
In the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and partial tribunal established by law. Judgment shall be pronounced publicly but the press and public may be excluded from all or part of the trial in the interests of morals, public order or national security in a democratic society, where the interests of juveniles or the protection of the private life of the parties so require, or to the extent strictly necessary in the opinion of the court in special circumstances where publicity would prejudice the interests of justice.

18.15 Art. 10 of the ECHR confers the right to freedom of expression. Accordingly, nothing should be done to prevent the publication to the wider public of accurate reports or proceedings by the media unless there is good and lawful reason. The open justice principle is recognised by parliament and the common law. It has been supplemented by statute.

18.16 S. 12 of the Human Rights Act makes provision for protection of journalistic and literary material against prior restraint but does not apply to criminal proceedings.

Judgments

18.17 The publication of written judgments is an important element in this discussion. Since 2000, the combined Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland approach allows written judgments to be reported on the Internet. Handwritten judgments submitted by the judiciary to the judges’ reference library for publication on the Internet are subject to a two-stage scrutiny (first by a member of the administration office and, thereafter, by a legal officer) to ensure compliance with all or any reporting restrictions. It should be borne in mind that the primary responsibility for ensuring such compliance rests with the judicial officer who is the author of the judgment and appropriate care should be taken in the preparation and proofreading of judgments to avoid a breach of any relevant or appropriate restrictions.

18.18 The British and Irish Legal Information Institute (BAILII) publishes court decisions online, including judgments made by the Northern Ireland High Court of Justice, Family Division. The decisions that are anonymised give an insight into the family court proceedings. Family Division judgments are published online.

18.19 In Northern Ireland, as elsewhere, the experience is that the press are not particularly anxious to attend divorces or ancillary relief proceedings, which are generally held in chambers. However, there may be more of an appetite, particularly amongst investigative journalists, to attend Children Order proceedings, where the result of those proceedings may be the removal of a child from the care of their parents.
Current position in other jurisdictions

ENGLAND AND WALES

18.20 The modern law in relation to the confidentiality of proceedings relating to children is contained principally in the Administration of Justice Act 1960 (the AJA), s. 12.

18.21 In England, child protection proceedings under the Children Act 1989, Part IV, are proceedings to which the Family Procedure Rules (FPR) 2010 apply and are, therefore, held in private. The prohibition established by AJA 1960, s. 12, remains in force after the conclusion of the proceedings.\(^8\)

18.22 The default position established by AJA 1960, s. 12, and FPR 2010, rule 27.10, is that publication of information relating to public law proceedings with respect to a child under the Children Act 1989 (the CA) is liable to be a contempt of court unless the court directs otherwise. It is well established that the family court and the High Court have the power to relax the prohibition on reporting on a case-by-case basis. The rules provide for exceptions with respect to communication of information from proceedings held in private in order to arrange for professional people and agencies to be engaged — for example, legal advisers, the Legal Services Agency, a welfare officer — in order to facilitate the progress of the proceedings.\(^9\)

18.23 The general public have no right to be present in private proceedings.\(^10\) Duly accredited representatives of news-gathering and reporting organisations can attend at a ‘private’ hearing, subject to the court’s power to exclude attendance. Attendance at a private hearing remains, however, subject to the overall restriction on publication imposed by AJA 1960, s. 12, and the specific restriction on naming the child and/or the child’s school established by CA 1989, s. 97(2).

18.24 Accordingly, under the current law in England, accredited media representatives can attend fact-finding hearings but they are unable to report what they saw, heard or read within the proceedings.

18.25 Thus, any presumption or principle in favour of open justice that applies generally to court proceedings does not apply to proceedings that are held in private and that relate to children.\(^11\) The default position in such cases is, as a matter of statute and the rules, one that prohibits the publication of any information relating to the proceedings. That default position, which is designed to protect children, can, where appropriate, be modified by a judge upon the application of a party or the media.

18.26 In England, these restrictions on open justice in such cases have been tempered by the President of the Family Division’s transparency initiative, the purpose of which is to allow greater public access to, and understanding of, the work of the family courts.

18.27 The President has drawn attention to the importance of transparency in the context of family justice in practice guidance12 and in a 2014 consultation document13 issued on 16 January 2014. As paragraph 1 of the former states, the guidance was ‘intended to bring about an immediate and significant change in practice in relation to the publication of judgments in family courts and the Court of Protection’.

18.28 The guidance then seeks to distinguish between two classes of judgment: those that the judge must ordinarily allow to be published, which includes ‘a substantial contested fact-finding hearing at which serious allegations, for example allegations of significant physical, emotional or sexual harm, have been determined’ and those that may be published.

18.29 The guidance explained that while a great deal of information about the history of the case could be set out in rulings that the President was encouraging judges to publish, the identity of minors and their relatives should be anonymised. Importantly, however, he said that the local authority and any expert witnesses involved should normally be named.

18.30 Anecdotal evidence from colleagues in England and research evidence is that it is still proving difficult to persuade some judges to put cases online on BAILII for publication/reporting and that there is only a small proportion of cases to be found there.14

18.31 Problems are recognised because, for example, even the date of birth can be sufficient to identify a child. Consideration is being given to providing more guidance on what should be contained in judgments. To that extent, there may have been a measure of rowing back from the guidelines in that, initially, the aim had been to name social workers, local authorities etc. One has to be careful to ensure that this will not provide identification or, in Northern Ireland, cause personal security problems.

18.32 In addition to the practice guidance of January 2014, a further consultation document was released on 17 August 2014 proposing significant reform to reach the goal of greater transparency in the family justice system. The service of applications for reporting restriction orders on the national media can now be effected through a Press Association copy direct service. What is most important is that the court retains the power to make without notice orders but such cases will be exceptional and an order will always give persons affected the liberty to apply, to vary or to discharge at short notice.

18.33 The clamour for greater openness in family courts in England and Wales on the part of some people has primarily been in connection with cases about children, both by campaigners for equal rights as between mothers and fathers, who say that the courts are variously biased against ordinary fathers or biased against protective mothers, and by those concerned with our approach in this country to removal, and particularly adoption, of children who have suffered or are at risk of harm. This led to legislation in England in 2009 and to new court rules that entitled the media to sit in on most sorts of family court hearings, a right that could be curtailed only in exceptional circumstances. However, the general public is still not entitled to attend those private hearings and there was no relaxation of what journalists were allowed to report. Consequently, the case has been made that journalists rarely bother to attend in cases about children. Hence the emphasis on the steps taken by Sir James Munby to move towards greater transparency as far as possible without statutory reform.

18.34 In financial cases involving celebrities or large money, there is perhaps a greater incentive to report by journalists. In recent years, High Court judges in England have adopted different, indeed almost conflicting, approaches to the loss of anonymity. On the one hand there is the view that couples who wish to resolve their disputes in private have many opportunities to do so, either in the court process — for example, during a dispute resolution hearing at which the press may not attend — or through arbitration or mediation. The effect, if not the intention, of this approach is to provide a disincentive to ‘newsworthy’ couples to engage in and continue frivolous and extremely expensive litigation that takes up the court’s time when it could be dealing with other cases. The contrary argument finds Mr Justice Mostyn taking the view that ‘some categories of court business, which are so personal and private that in almost every case where anonymisation is sought the right to privacy will trump the right to unfettered freedom of expression’.

18.35 This unsatisfactory state of affairs arguably found the former argument attracting greater weight in a recent case before the Court of Appeal in England where the court held that a divorcee who was fighting her husband for a larger payment was identified after the Appeal Court judges lifted an order protecting her anonymity. In this case several media organisations challenged the order of anonymisation claiming it would have a chilling effect on the reporting of divorce appeals.

Mr Justice Holman heard these cases of financial dispute between couples in public and expressed ‘a pressing need for more openness’ in financial cases. He said: ‘To permit the presence of accredited journalists, but then tightly to restrict what they can report, creates a mere illusion of transparency.’

17 Norman v Norman [2017] EWCA Civ 120.
18.36 The then Minister for Justice signed an order to ease a long-standing ban on journalists reporting on family law and child care court proceedings on 11 January 2014, namely the Courts and Civil Law (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2013. As the Justice Minister Frances Fitzgerald said:

This reform of the in-camera rule was made to enable the media, researchers and legal professionals to gain access to valuable information on the operation of the law in this area. We have all seen the results of this change in the form of increased coverage of family law proceedings in both print and other media. This coverage has proven in the round to be very responsible, in that while public interest issues have been highlighted for debate, this has been done in such a way as to protect identities of individuals involved.

18.37 The Act removed the blanket ban on reporters attending family law, child care and adoption cases in courts around the state, thus enabling the media to cover proceedings dealing with divorce, separation, domestic violence, maintenance and custody as well as those cases where the state takes children into care. The law also imposed a strict ban on the publication of any material likely to lead to the identification of any individual involved. Under the Act it remains open to the court to exclude representatives of the media or otherwise restrict their attendance during the hearing of parts of it, or to restrict or prohibit the publication or broadcasting of evidence given or referred to during the proceedings. The Civil Liability and Courts Act 2004 is still in force and prohibits the publication or broadcasting of any information that would be likely to lead members of the public to identify the parties to family law proceedings or any children to whom the proceedings relate.

18.38 The move, echoing to some extent the reforms introduced by the President of the Family Division in England and Wales, was declared to be in the public interest — namely, there should be a greater knowledge of the administration of the law in these areas and the reforms would provide valuable information to the public, judiciary and legal professionals.

18.39 The minister, however, referred to the fact that the public’s right to know must be balanced against the family’s right to privacy, and the court, therefore, retains the power to exclude journalists or to restrict reporting in certain circumstances. Again, the emphasis is on the attempt to strike an appropriate balance between transparency and the best interests of the children being protected.

18.40 Divorce and ancillary relief proceedings are included but are also the subject of a number of factors that the court will consider in deciding whether to restrict reporting or exclude journalists. Of significance is the need to protect the party against coercion, intimidation and harassment, and a judge may also consider whether information given in evidence is likely to be either commercially or personally sensitive. This would cover information relating to the medical history of someone, their tax affairs or sexual orientation.
Responses

18.41 This issue of open justice proved to be the most controversial of all the chapters in this Review. Our respondents expressed strongly held views on either side of the argument about open justice and there is clearly no consensus of opinion on the way forward. It is plainly a complicated issue upon which polarised and strongly held views are held by people whose views command the highest respect.

18.42 Amongst those strongly opposed to further media intrusion into family courts involving children were the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Children and Young People (NICCY), VOYPIC (Voice of Young People in Care), Family Mediation Northern Ireland, the Northern Ireland Guardian Ad Litem Association (NIGALA), the Women’s Aid Federation, the Children’s Law Centre and the Northern Ireland Social Care Council. Both the Law Society and the Family Bar Association felt that further steps would need much more public consultation and research before extending the rights of the media from the current position.

18.43 We spoke to the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Children and Young People, Koulla Yiasouma. Having seen preliminary views of the Family Justice Report, she kindly undertook to seek the views of young people who have had experience of the family justice system on this topic. To carry out this exercise, NICCY worked closely with VOYPIC and NIGALA to complete the programme of engagement. Twenty-three children with an age range from 13 to 18 from every health trust area in Northern Ireland who had been involved in private and public law proceedings were interviewed. The full report is well worth reading and is on the NICCY website. Some of the conclusions are as follows:

- increased media reporting in family cases would diminish the public confidence of children and young people in the system;
- young people did not believe that they could mitigate the concerns or breaches of the rights of children and young people involved with increased media reporting;
- children fear exposure and that personal, painful and humiliating information will get out into the public domain and they will be embarrassed, ashamed and bullied at school, in neighbourhoods and communities;
- young people or children should give consent before any information about them is used in the media;
- there were concerns around jigsaw identification; and
- they were particularly concerned about the idea of information being posted on social media.

18.44 NICCY was, therefore, wholly against increased media reporting in family cases, recording that there had been instances of irresponsible and inaccurate reporting in the media in cases involving children.¹⁹

18.45 The case against increased media presence in the children’s courts made by these bodies can be summarised as follows:

- Public confidence in family courts can and should be addressed in ways that do not put already vulnerable children at risk. There are other ways to let the public know how the family courts work.

- The Government and parliament should have the opportunity to scrutinise proposals to increase media access in reporting of family cases since the safeguards originally put in have now been removed.

- Proposals should be subject to a proper public consultation exercise over an appropriate timescale, accompanied by widespread publicity, making it clear what is proposed, what children think and helping other people to respond. Just as the adult going through sensitive, deeply private troubles would not want them broadcast or published, children and young people have a right to both privacy and dignity. The courts need to listen to their concerns.

- In April 2016, in error, a judgment in England from care proceedings was published on BAILII relating to a fact-finding hearing in respect of sexual abuse to a young child in which all the parties, including the child and both parents and the intervenor (against whom allegations were made) and the local authority, were named in full. All the details of the allegations and the medical evidence were set out in full and graphic detail. In the event, no harm was done and the case was removed within 24 hours. However, this illustrates the need for strong guidance on anonymisation, which must be accompanied by judicial and Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service (NICTS) human resource training if it is to be wholly effective. The latter must lay down robust operational procedures to ensure that privacy is maintained in such cases.

- The significant risk in a small jurisdiction such as Northern Ireland comes from jigsaw identification, where the child or family involved are identified by piecing together details of the case that are in the public domain. More rigorous assessment may need to be applied in Northern Ireland than elsewhere in the United Kingdom and Ireland, taking into account the unique nature of a small state where geographical and cultural considerations will have to be applied. A small and otherwise innocuous reference to a particular trust area, school or geographical area could serve to identify a child and their family. There is, therefore, perhaps an argument for more stringent regulations and a more forensic examination of what the media can or cannot report in Northern Ireland.

• The potential for the sensationalising not only of Children Order cases but also divorce and ancillary relief proceedings, and the need to guard against the recanting of evidence by a child or young person, simply because they do not want the media to hear that evidence, are all very relevant considerations.

• Proposals for statute-based open justice should not be pursued without a formal s. 75-compliant consultation process being undertaken and that process should fully engage with children and young people.

• Art. 16 of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child is clear that children have the right of protection from interference with privacy, family and home.

18.46 Information in proceedings relating to children relate inextricably to their emotional and psychological development. The argument is that there is a very real public interest in protecting children from the inevitable trauma of knowing that their details are ‘out there’. This extends beyond the child and includes the psychological impact to a parent.

18.47 Indelible harm can be caused to children if anonymisation fails to operate effectively because of jigsaw identification, where the information released is sufficient to identify a child. This is a particularly relevant consideration in our jurisdiction, taking into account size, ability to identify geographical locations, the small number of trust areas and different cultural concerns.

18.48 This area of law was investigated by the Children’s Commissioner in England in 2010. She spoke with more than 50 children and young people. The overwhelming view was that reporters should not be allowed into family court proceedings because the hearings address matters that are intensely private. The children stated they did not believe their personal details were the business of either newspapers or the general public. There was also a feeling that the press get facts wrong and that children and young people felt strongly that articles could be sensationalised. There is a very real fear that if they are identified, bullying and harassment within their schools and elsewhere would be a result. Also, children and young people would not speak freely to professionals charged with undertaking assessments if a reporter is in court to hear the evidence. This in turn could seriously impact on a judge’s ability to make difficult and often life-changing decisions in a child’s best interest.

18.49 The counterargument for more open and accountable justice, led in our responses understandably by The Detail, an investigative news and analysis website that is dedicated to in-depth reporting on issues of vital public interest, can be summarised as follows:

20 Dr Julia Brophy carried out important research into children and young people’s views on media access to the family courts. In her 2010 study, she concluded that ‘children fear “exposure”: they are afraid that personal, painful and humiliating information will “get out” and they will be embarrassed, ashamed and bullied at school, in neighbourhoods and communities’. A number of cases in English courts have considered the principles of open justice and how they apply to the reporting of cases. These cases are referred to in a series of articles by Mary Lazarus, a barrister of 42 Bedford Row, published in three parts in the Family Law Week in 2014.
There is a strong argument for much more open justice in the family courts, even if the families concerned have to be anonymised, as it would increase public confidence in the courts. It would serve to remove suspicion that miscarriages of justice are happening behind closed doors, where a judge relies particularly on the evidence of an unaccountable expert. As the response of the family Bar pointed out, a perception exists that the family courts are lacking in transparency and there is merit in addressing public confidence in the family courts in an effort to aid understanding of the work undertaken at each court tier. Replies to our public website are replete with allegations of unfairness, secrecy etc. in our system. Charges, however unjustified and spurious, of secret courts, bias in favour of women and hidden judgments that have emerged here and in the press need to be challenged if the rule of law is not to be traduced. An even greater danger, however, is that where serious injustice takes place it may go unreported.

Recently, investigative journalism has highlighted as front-page news how violent and abusive men are being allowed to confront and cross-examine their former partners ‘in secretive hearings that fail to protect women who are victims of abuse’. This article continued:

Keeping secrets goes on and they are kept silent.’

The family justice system must be seen to be challenging the practice and policy of agencies and organisations charged with the protection of vulnerable children and young people, particularly if judgments in the court can serve to inform and shape future policy. The Baby P case in England highlighted the need for public scrutiny of professionals and organisations charged with the protection of children and the early identification of risks to children remaining in the care of their parents or other individuals. Media coverage could be argued to be essential if children are to remain on the political agenda and child protection services are to remain accountable.

Important statements are often made by judges during family court hearings, but due to the private nature of proceedings these are not routinely heard by the public. We have experience in Northern Ireland of judgments, when published, helping to inform and shape policy matters, such as trusts needing to reassess their decision-making procedures where considerations are given to what supports and assessments should be put in place for parents to allow the children either to remain in their care or to be rehabilitated to their care. The BBC recently reported a decision by Mr Justice O’Hara where, after studying expert evidence, he approved the separation of a teenage child from her mother and the transfer of the child to the appropriate support centre in the Republic of Ireland. In the reporting of that case, the press referred to Mr Justice O’Hara expressing his surprise that statutory agencies had not shown a real interest in the child’s home education and domestic arrangements years sooner. The public are entitled to know that statutory agencies will be held accountable for their actions or inactivity. Accordingly, absent positive evidence of the risk of identifying the child by so doing or the risk of danger to, for instance, a social worker, trusts and the experts called should be named as in all other types of litigation. The Detail submission contends that local authority and any expert witnesses should be named, particularly as their opinions could have significant impact on a child or family. It would ensure transparency and accountability. Also, covering such a wide geographical area, it would be difficult to identify the child, particularly since trusts are already identified in published judgments.

- The arguments in favour of transparency are powerful ones and the importance of freedom of expression in open justice cannot be overstated. In Crown Court cases, extremely sensitive information relating to children’s lives and locations is discussed, with no reporting restrictions other than the media being prevented, and even then not in all cases, from using the children’s names. Recently, the Court of Appeal in Northern Ireland, dealing with a family case involving the construction of a statute, made it clear that the approach of the Court of Appeal in future will be that ‘unless there is some compelling reason given for the court to be cleared, for example perhaps in cases where evidence is going to be heard, the public will be admitted to the hearing of family appeals’.22

- The balance between a general principle of open and accountable justice and properly competing interests can be achieved by a clear understanding of the legal basis for the imposition of restrictions on the part of judiciary, court staff and the media.

- Journalists are unlikely to attend proceedings that cannot be reported upon. Judges would of course, if necessary, announce at the outset of proceedings or indeed at any stage during the hearing or in the judgment that particular cases may be reported. Moreover, the press could make applications at any stage of the proceedings if they were admitted to the courtroom as is suggested.

- Apprehensions about the dangers of courts open to the media could be overcome by establishing in advance an expert panel comprising representatives from the judiciary, statutory and voluntary organisations and members of the media working together from an early stage to forge a protocol governing ground rules for the admission of the media.\textsuperscript{23}

- The courts have been successfully opened to the media in England and Wales and the Republic of Ireland.

- The Attorney General in his response indicated that he was interested in the suggestion that the media be allowed to attend some family court hearings. He agreed that it was important in rule of law terms that we have open justice even if the prohibition on reporting remains.

Discussion

18.50 ‘Transparency’ is much more than simply allowing passive public scrutiny of our processes and outcomes. Those who operate in the family justice system need to be proactive in shining a light on our work so as to generate a far greater understanding amongst the public of what lies behind the important decisions that are taken about children by the courts, as an arm of the state, in the public’s name.\textsuperscript{24} Whilst the matter has not been beyond plausible dispute, our recommendation is that the media should be afforded the right to attend fact-finding hearings and other family courts in Northern Ireland in line with the position in the rest of the UK and Ireland. To dispel concerns about the secrecy of hearings, it is imperative that we ensure the principle of open justice is fully observed and that the press, as a watchdog of the public interest, are at the very least entitled to attend and observe the process. It is this development that will materially contribute to the correction of much of the ill-informed and inaccurate information that abounds about the family justice system. We therefore recommend the introduction of rules similar to rule 27.10 and rule 27.11 of the Family Procedure Rules in England and Wales be introduced here in Northern Ireland.

18.51 The right of the media to attend in every case, however, should not mean that the press are at liberty to report everything that they see, hear or read within the proceedings. Given the context of Northern Ireland, the firm views expressed by children in the NICCY report, which we suspect reflects a widespread view of children, and the danger of jigsaw identification in a jurisdiction as small as Northern Ireland, we are satisfied that permission to report should be only with the leave of the family court and the High Court. In short, at any stage in the proceedings the court should have power to relax the prohibition on reporting on a case-by-case basis by means of a rule similar but not identical to rule 12.73 of the Family Procedure Rules. We consider that the difference in our rules should reflect the fact that such permission should be granted only where the judge considers it is in the public interest to do so or for some other compelling reason within the discretion of the judge. We consider that there is validity in the caution suggested by The Detail to the effect that where reporting restrictions to this effect are imposed, they should be placed and read at the top of the judgment to alert journalists to the nature of the restriction. There is no reason why the press should not be entitled to make applications to a judge at any stage of the proceedings for the implementation of the power to relax the prohibition on reporting. Finally, in this regard we also consider that the court should have power to permit any member of the public to attend in the interests of justice.

18.52 Accordingly, every court should have a proper procedure for ensuring that adequate steps are taken to draw any discretionary restriction order to the attention of media representatives who may not have been in court when the order was made. Courts should ensure the procedure has been followed.

18.53 However, the obligation remains on the media to ensure that they take the appropriate steps to make themselves aware of any discretionary reporting restrictions and to comply fully with them (see Attorney General’s application, [Sunday World]).

18.54 NICTS ICOS should now record all non-automatic reporting restrictions against the name of the case to which it applies.

18.55 The family justice system should not fear public scrutiny with the present safeguards. There are circumstances in which the court can exclude the public and media and impose temporary or permanent restrictions on the media’s reports of court proceedings by making a court order. The court can exercise its discretion also to hear media representations on the lifting of such restrictions.

18.56 We consider there is merit in the suggestion by the respondents from The Detail that there should be something in the nature of a protocol drawn up after representations from the judiciary, the professions and members of the media outlining guidelines for reporting cases in the Family Division. This would include matters such as how journalists will be notified of cases in advance, how media enquiries can be dealt with within the court system etc. In short if the press are to be admitted on the basis of a principle of open justice, it needs to be a meaningful admission.

18.57 Three further discrete matters arise in this context. First, is the child’s welfare paramount in the balancing decision taken by the judge as to the level of media presence and reporting? The Court of Appeal in England and Wales recently indicated in England that there may be a conflict, or at least a tension, between the apparently accepted view that welfare is not the paramount consideration on an issue such as this, on the one hand, and some Court of Appeal authority to the contrary on the other hand. This is obviously a matter that ought to grip the attention of the Northern Ireland Court of Appeal when a suitable case arises.

18.58 Secondly, ‘live’ daily reporting is a novel development in child protection proceedings. It is a process that goes far further in terms of transparency than the mere publication of the final judgment, which is the focus of the guidance from the current President of the Family Division, and it is a topic that is really only at the ‘preliminary pre-consultation’ stage of discussion within the family justice system generally.

18.59 A judge would need to put in place detailed arrangements to maintain some control on the material that could be reported by press representatives who were attending court. In Re W, the Court of Appeal said that in circumstances where the final judgment will be published in due course, the issue of daily reporting relates to the quantity and timing of reporting rather than reporting the facts of this case as such in principle. It is a matter that calls for a proportionate approach on which a trial judge is entitled to exercise a wide margin of discretion, albeit the Court of Appeal confessed ‘to having a feeling of substantial unease at this degree of openness at the start of an unpredictable fact finding exercise’. It tightened up the wording originally provided by the judge (which was to the effect that ‘such reporting is subject to any further directions given by the court concerning what can and cannot be published if an issue arises during the course of the hearing’) to the extent that it added to the first instance judge’s order the following words: ‘Such reporting (whether by live reporting, Twitter or otherwise) may not take place until after the court proceedings have concluded on any given day, in order to ensure that the court has had an opportunity to consider whether any such additional directions are required.’

18.60 In the event that daily reporting is likely to occur, detailed arrangements should be put in place to maintain control on the material that can be reported by press representatives who are attending court and a suggested order would be to the effect that ‘such reporting is subject to any further directions given by the court concerning what can and cannot be published if an issue arises during the course of the hearing. Such reporting, whether by live reporting, Twitter or otherwise, may not take place until after the court proceedings have concluded on any given day, in order to ensure that the court has had an opportunity to consider whether any such additional directions are required.’

18.61 Thirdly, there needs to be some clarity about whether the identity of other people should be disclosed. In the Republic of Ireland, there would appear to be clarity in that no individual should be named. In England, the direction of travel is that individuals such as social workers, experts and local authority individuals etc. should be named. In a small jurisdiction such as Northern Ireland, naming of such parties could lead to identification of the child or social workers, so we recommend that courts should be particularly cautious in their approach to such identification.

Recommendations

1. Relevant legislative changes to be made to provide for the rights of the media to attend fact-finding hearings and other family courts in Northern Ireland and be brought into line with the position in the rest of the UK and Ireland. We recommend the introduction of rules similar to rule 27.10(2) and rule 27.11(2) of the Family Procedure Rules (FPR) in England and Wales. [FJ138]

2. The law to remain that the media are unable to report what they saw, heard or read within the proceedings without permission of the court but the family court and the High Court at any stage of the proceedings should have the power to relax the prohibition on reporting on a case-by-case basis by means of a rule similar to FPR 2010, rule 12.73, save that the criteria for relaxation should be based on the court concluding that it is in the public interest to do so or for some other compelling reason why it should be published. [FJ139]

3. Every court to have a proper procedure for ensuring that adequate steps are taken to draw any discretionary restriction order to the attention of media representatives who may not have been in court when the order was made. A judge should ensure the procedure has been followed. [FJ140]

4. However, the obligation to remain on the media to ensure that they take the appropriate steps to make themselves aware of any discretionary reporting restrictions and to comply fully with them.28 [FJ141]

5. The Senior Family Judge to secure the drafting of a practice note or guidance on the publication of judgments similar to that drawn up in England in January 201429 and exhibited at appendix 6 to this Report. [FJ142]

6. In order to secure consistency of approach across all family courts in the making of reporting restriction orders, a practice note similar to that drawn up in England in August 2014, containing links to model forms for both draft orders and explanatory notes, to be created. [FJ143]

7. In the event that daily reporting is likely to be permitted, detailed arrangements to be put in place to maintain control on the material that can be reported by press representatives who are attending court. [FJ144]

8. A joint protocol between the judiciary, the profession and the representative body for the press in Northern Ireland, outlining guidelines for reporting cases in the Family Division, to be created. [FJ145]

9. Consideration to be given to the means of securing the service of applications for reporting restriction orders on the national and local media through a Press Association copy direct service. [FJ146]

10. Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service’s ICOS now to record all non-automatic reporting restrictions against the name of the case to which it applies. [FJ147]

Personal litigants

Current position

19.1 In general terms, family law practitioners in Northern Ireland have encountered greater numbers of self-represented litigants in recent years.

19.2 Family lawyers in Northern Ireland believe that this trend has been fuelled by a number of factors, including a reduction in the availability of legal aid and a belief among some that family disputes do not require specialist legal advice and representation.

19.3 However, in this jurisdiction there have also been some intractable and long-running family disputes in which a self-represented litigant mistrusts and/or has no regard for the legal profession and family justice system. These disputes have taken up a disproportionate amount of court time and, in some instances, have been very stressful for the opposing party, court staff and some members of the legal profession.

19.4 There are a number of glaring problems in the current system in Northern Ireland, which can be summarised as follows.

19.5 There is insufficient data or access to what data there is.

19.6 There has been insufficient research regarding:

- the number of self-represented litigants in the family justice system in Northern Ireland (at every level of the court system);
- the reasons why people self-represent in family litigation;
- the key characteristics of self-represented people in family litigation in Northern Ireland; and
- the effect of self-representation on the administration of family justice in Northern Ireland.

19.7 The written guidance available for self-representing litigants on the Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service (NICTS) website is limited to proceedings in the High Court. It is generic guidance and contains no checklist for family or matrimonial proceedings, albeit NI Direct provides step-by-step advice about getting a divorce or dissolution of a civil partnership in Northern Ireland.1

19.8 There is no accessible guidance on the NICTS website for family proceedings in the magistrates’ courts or county courts.

1 https://www.nidirect.gov.uk/articles/getting-divorcedissolution-civil-partnership
19.9 There is no guidance on the NICTS website specific to self-represented litigants in family or matrimonial litigation.

19.10 It is very likely that NICTS staff who work in the court offices are called upon to assist personal litigants (PLs) who seek or need advice about how to fill in forms, draft affidavits or statements of evidence and about the court process in general. This is bound to be time-consuming and diverts staff from other tasks.

19.11 Valuable court time is taken up offering guidance to self-represented litigants. In cases involving self-represented litigants who mistrust lawyers or the legal system, a disproportionate amount of court time has been taken up in some cases, with irrelevant argument and lines of inquiry. This has the unintended consequences of increasing costs and stress for the opposing party. This is an important variable in family cases, which by their very nature are upsetting and at times overwhelming for parties.

19.12 These local problems are not confined to Northern Ireland. They mirror the findings of the 2006–07 research conducted by the Ministry of Justice in New Zealand, which found that Since Family Court cases can be more complex and personal, key informants suggested that self-represented litigants are more likely to stay in the court system longer and make repeated requests on key informants’ time … Self-represented family litigants were found to increase the other party’s costs and stress. Children could be upset and unsettled.

19.13 Speaking to the House of Commons Justice Committee on 26 January 2016, Sir James Munby, President of the Family Division, said:

The general level of provision of information for litigants in person, whether in relation to the system or in relation to fee remission, is woefully inadequate. My perception, from the perspective of the family justice system, is that there is a need to provide information for litigants in person … Only very recently has there been any kind of indication from either Whitehall or Westminster that something effective is going to be done.

I suspect on the ground, particularly in the family cases, there has traditionally been a large amount of informal help and, as far as it is permissible, guidance and advice on how to apply and what you have to do.

Now the general assumption would be that the system, even as revised and revamped, is still of labyrinthine complexity. It is almost certainly couched in language that most people do not understand — why should they?

What we have done in the family system — not on fee remissions — is to make use of Advicenow, which is an organisation that goes through documents to make sure they are presented in a user-friendly way, in a way that is accessible to the ordinary man and woman in the street. This has paid enormous dividends. We need to do more of that.

19.14 A March 2016 Citizens Advice publication, Standing Alone: Going to the Family Court without a Lawyer, looked at the issue of personal litigants in the family courts in England. It concluded that the way people use them is changing. Since funding for legal aid was reduced in 2013, there has been an increase in the number of people going to the family courts without a lawyer (as a litigant in person). Two thirds of Citizens Advice advisers report an increase in the number of people they see going to court without representation.

19.15 Although some people found the experience of self-representation positive, the majority found self-representing difficult, time-consuming and emotionally draining. As well as a bad experience for court users, it means litigants in person achieve worse outcomes compared with their represented counterparts.

19.16 Nine in 10 litigants in person said it affected at least one other aspect of their life. The report explored four key areas affected: mental and physical health, working lives, finances and relationships.

19.17 The report identified eight ways to improve the process of going to the family court alone:

1. Litigants in person need a clear way to navigate through the court process
2. Information should be easy to find, consistent, reliable and user-friendly
3. Paperwork and processes should be designed with the layperson in mind
4. The physical court environment must help, not hinder, litigants in person
5. Litigants in person need the tools to cope with pre-trial negotiations
6. Guidance for legal professionals needs universal adoption
7. People need more information to make the most of lawyers’ services
8. Evidence requirements should not be a barrier to those eligible for legal aid

19.18 The report makes three key recommendations about how courts, professionals and other service providers can address these challenges:

1. Litigants in person need access to reliable advice and information to determine the validity of their case; investigate alternatives to court; progress their case through different stages; and represent themselves effectively and deal with outcomes.
2. Processes, physical courts and professionals’ behaviour should respond to the increased numbers of litigants in person by ensuring best practice for working with laypeople is provided consistently.
3. Support for vulnerable people should be more easily accessed. Victims of domestic abuse should be able to access the legal advice and representation to which they are entitled. Other vulnerable groups, such as people with mental health issues, should be signposted to appropriate services.
Discussion

19.19 It must be said at the outset that personal litigants will be with us to stay, and we need to devise a user-friendly, strategic approach to assist them. That will also be helpful to the courts.

19.20 We must not conflate personal litigants with vexatious personal litigants. Moreover, there is not a simple binary situation: someone who has legal representation and someone who does not and, by implication, never had access to legal advice.

19.21 Rigorous data-recording practices should be established across each tier of the family court system and in each geographical division. This should enable proper and periodic analysis of self-represented litigants, identifying whether there are any variations between courts or divisions. The data obtained would then inform whether a regional approach is appropriate or whether there are certain divisions or areas of practice that encounter most problems.

19.22 An additional tool to advance our knowledge of PLs would be the provision of feedback from them in a formal questionnaire issued to each one at all tiers to measure their experience together with any suggested improvements.

19.23 The research on litigants in person in private family cases by Liz Trinder and others (November 2014) for the Ministry of Justice looked at the evidence concerning PLs in private family law cases in five courts in England and Wales, including behavioural drivers, experience and support needs. The work covered the period January to March 2013 prior to the removal of private family law from the scope of legal aid in England and Wales. The research was both quantitative (observations, interviews with PLs, lawyers, judges and court officials) and quantitative (examination of files, statistics, available information etc.).

19.24 The research found that PLs often start with legal representation but then lose it — usually for financial reasons — and, in some cases, access support through advice centres, McKenzie friends etc. Many PLs were responding to legal action rather than initiating actions. Moreover, the PLs observed in the Trinder study had lower levels of drug, alcohol and mental health problems than the legally aided group observed (this may well reflect the income levels that prevent entitlement to legal aid in the first place). The vast majority of unrepresented litigants in the private family cases were not vexatious.

19.25 There is no evidence before us to suggest there would be markedly different findings in Northern Ireland. However, there is a need for data to be collected and research to be carried out to assess properly both the incidence and effects of self-representation in the family courts in Northern Ireland.

19.26 Hence, we welcome the research into the needs and experiences of PLs, which commenced in April 2016 for two years and was conducted by the Human Rights Commission and Ulster University’s school of law. It will involve observations in the family courts and bankruptcy proceedings, interviews with PLs, judges, lawyers and others, and an analysis of the characteristics of PLs and how they become PLs in the first place. The research will also provide a human rights analysis of the right to representation under art. 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights and the running of a legal clinic for some PLs to provide signposting and process advice on how the courts work to see if this is of any value. Finally, the research will look at what materials and other sources of support are used by PLs and the information provided by the courts.

19.27 Given that the research findings will post-date the Review, we consider that the arrival of this empirical data would be a fruitful area for the new Family Justice Board\(^2\) to consider.

19.28 We have researched to some extent Advicenow. It is a public legal information website set up by Law for Life: The Foundation for Public Legal Education, a charity established to equip people with the knowledge, information and skills to resolve successfully problems encountered in everyday life. The Advicenow website translates the law into accessible and engaging information ‘which not only explains the law but empowers you to use it’. It performs international work for disadvantaged communities and has a European Erasmus programme. However, essentially, Advicenow relates to England and Wales only.

19.29 We understand Her Majesty’s Courts and Tribunals Service provided the law to Advicenow, which translated the law into language that could be understood by the average person. It used, for example, cartoons and captions that were user-friendly.

19.30 The Advicenow website suggests searchers from Northern Ireland might seek assistance from Citizens Advice in Northern Ireland. For a similar venture we would obviously require a similar group here to set up a website communicating the Northern Ireland legal position. There may not be a similar charitable group to that of Law for Life. Therefore, realistically, we are back to the default position of NICIS providing the hub recommended earlier in this Report.\(^3\) At the very least, such a hub doubtless could enlist advice and assistance from Advicenow in such a venture. There should be a move away from the conventional printed fact sheets and a more interactive approach adopted.

19.31 We need to significantly raise the level of public education and awareness as to the way in which the family system operates. NICIS should provide an information hub for personal litigants along the lines advocated by Advicenow. It must be couched in appropriately plain language with an emphasis on information, education, what the courts expect and how the court will assist the PL. It should not assume the PL is a vexatious litigant.

\(^2\) See chapter 20.

\(^3\) See chapters 8 and 9.
19.32 Consideration should also be given to a central information hub located in specified court buildings — for example, Laganside in Belfast — which would be staffed by at least one person trained by NICTS specifically to assist personal litigants. Such an online advice line and staffed centre should provide accessible and easy-to-understand guidance for personal litigants in the magistrates’ court, county court and the High Court.4

19.33 The Trinder research noted the complexity of forms and materials in the England and Wales system. We are no different. Litigants in person need a clear way to navigate through the court process. Information should be easy to find, consistent, reliable and user-friendly. Paperwork and processes should be designed with the layperson in mind.

19.34 NICtS should conduct a review of current forms to ensure they are appropriately plain and comprehensive for all court users.

There is no good reason why that hub should not complement the use of social media such as YouTube and provide short videos on aspects of bringing a claim to court. This could include, by way of example:

- a guide to the forms and applications that have to be completed;
- the stages through which cases progress;
- time limits for applications and appeals;
- alternatives to the court process;
- a description of the court environment, how the court is to be addressed etc.;
- rudimentary guidelines as to how evidence is taken and obtained in the family court system;
- the consequences of refusal to obey court orders;
- voluntary help that is available;
- the use of McKenzie friends;
- signposts to services for the vulnerable; and
- cost implications of the legal process.

19.36 The court process itself must adjust to the arrival of PLs. The first hearing in family proceedings involving personal litigants should be regarded as a serious case management opportunity. The judge should take time not only to advise as to the benefits of legal advice and the availability of pro bono and voluntary services but outline what is expected from all parties, what the case is essentially about, options to resolve the case not only outside but inside the court and the nature of the 4 Bristol family court has established a family court information website aimed at families who find themselves involved in proceedings. It gives straightforward, down-to-earth descriptions of the process, together with links to videos and other material elsewhere available. Lord Justice McFarlane, in his 2017 Bridget Lindley OBE memorial lecture, asserted that the website cost under £1,000 to establish.

process, including timetabling, so that there are no unrealistic expectations. It should, in effect, constitute a ground rules hearing.

19.37 Courts should indicate that they may set specific court times for hearings involving PLs — or indeed any litigant whether represented or not. Thus time limits on the length of openings, evidence, closing submissions etc. can all be usefully fixed. Mr Justice O’Hara used this to good effect in a recent hearing involving PLs.

19.38 It is important that the judiciary and the professions be alert to the possible existence of a disability on the part of a PL. Accordingly, it is imperative that all judges should be familiar with and guided by the current Equal Treatment Bench Book. They should be alert to PLs who may have a disability, such as an autistic spectrum condition, and be ready to make appropriate adjustments to procedures to accommodate this from the outset. The Northern Ireland Court of Appeal recently dealt with such a case and laid down appropriate guidelines.\(^5\)

19.39 In truth, it may well be that, if the proliferation in PLs continues in Northern Ireland, the family courts and the legal professions will have to consider fresh approaches to the issues before it. The traditional adversarial approach may not meet the needs of justice in such circumstances, particularly where one or other party may have a disability. The inquisitorial approach, already a frequent presence in the family court, may become even more prevalent. Albeit in the very different arena of a civil libel action in the High Court in England,\(^6\) we cite the recent approach of the judge dealing with two personal litigants, where he said:

111. Because both sides were litigants in person, I conducted the hearing by asking first Ms Hunter and then Ms Mole about each of the matters complained of in the counter claim. I then gave each of them an opportunity of asking questions of the other. Ms Mole chose to ask no questions. I then went through the chronology of events as I understood them to be, inviting each of them to correct or complement the understanding I had formed on my own reading of the papers and to make their submissions. Before doing this I invited each party for their consent to the procedure I proposed to adopt … I also indicated that I also proposed to hear both applications before me before making a ruling on either of them.

19.40 This procedure may be an example of what the Lord Chief Justice of England and Wales, Lord Thomas, referred to in a lecture to JUSTICE the week after this hearing (on 3 March 2014) when he cited with approval The Judicial Working Group on Litigants in Person: Report at paragraphs 2.10 and 5.11 and page 33. This report recommended that there be consideration of the introduction of a specific power into CPR Rule 3.1 that would allow the court to direct that, where at least one party is a litigant in person, the proceedings should be conducted by way of a more inquisitorial form of process.

19.41 On the issue of pro bono representation, we take this opportunity to recommend the implementation in Northern Ireland of the equivalent to s. 194 of the Legal Services Act 2007, which allows pro bono cost orders to be made where a client represented pro bono wins his or her case. These costs are then paid to the Access to Justice Foundation, which uses the money to support pro bono initiatives. The Bar, the Law Society, the Public Interest Litigation Support Project and the Law Centre are already on record as supporting such an initiative.

19.42 Both the Bar and the Law Society need guidance for members as to the problem of its members dealing with PLs. They should draw up a joint protocol governing the approach to be adopted to PLs, ensuring best practice for working with laypeople is consistently provided.

The Family Justice Council in England recently produced a guide to help PLs who may be confronting the seemingly daunting prospect of negotiating their own agreements in the context of divorce and family breakdown. The guide, Sorting Out Finances on Divorce, is intended to demystify what is a complex area of law, which many PLs may find intimidating. It provides a succinct summary of the law to help those who cannot afford legal advice to reach financial agreements without the need to go to court. The guidance is specifically aimed at a lay audience and its primary purpose is to provide a road map through what is often, for many, uncharted territory. It sets out in clear terms how the family court approaches financial needs on divorce. Advicenow has produced a shorter online version of the working group’s document in plain English.

19.44 The guide was a response to the Law Commission’s recommendation in its 2014 report on matrimonial property, needs and agreements for greater clarity regarding the distribution of assets and the determination of financial needs on divorce and civil partnership dissolution. The then Minister of State for Justice, Simon Hughes, wrote asking the Family Justice Council to take forward this recommendation. The chair of the Family Justice Council, Sir James Munby, asked Mrs Justice Roberts to chair a small but hugely experienced working group, whose task was to produce this guide.

19.45 This illustrates two important matters of which we should take note. First, the task of meeting the needs of laypersons and PLs is an ongoing process that needs to be addressed as and when need arises. Secondly, it serves to illustrate a classic example of the value of joined-up and inclusive thinking between government departments and the legal fraternity to produce judge-led outcome-focused work to improve access to services. PLs provide fertile ground for joint working between departments and the legal fraternity, particularly through the Family Justice Board. It should be a harbinger of the manner in which our proposed Family Justice Board would work in the future.

Protection of witnesses from cross-examination by personal litigants

19.46 As highlighted in an earlier chapter, recent investigative journalism has highlighted the fact that, in England and Wales, violent and abusive men are allegedly ‘being allowed to confront and cross-examine their former partners in secretive court hearings that fail to protect women who are victims of abuse’. That article asserted that the evidence obtained by the newspaper from participants, lawyers and court officials revealed how in that jurisdiction the family court

- allows men with criminal convictions to abuse their ex-partners by directly questioning them — sometimes repeatedly;
- allows men to ignore restraining orders imposed by the criminal courts to protect the women;
- allows fathers, no matter how violent or abusive, to repeatedly pursue contact with children and their mothers;
- ignores expert evidence that women are at risk from abusive men; and
- fails to adequately protect vulnerable victims of domestic and sexual abuse.

19.47 The article went on to allege that research by the all-party parliamentary group on domestic violence found that 55% of women had no access to special measures in the family courts, where 70% of separation and child contact cases involved some form of domestic violence. The article cited Polly Neate, chief executive of Women’s Aid, presenting research to the judiciary showing ‘a quarter of victims of domestic violence surveyed had been cross-examined by abusive partners’.

19.48 The article asserts that the cuts to legal aid and cutbacks in the whole court estate have contributed to the situation for vulnerable women within the family courts and is becoming worse. The alleged cause was the ‘antiquated’ family court system, where legal aid cuts mean increasing numbers of men and women representing themselves in court, thus increasing the chance of some men being able to use the process as part of their continuing harassment, abuse and controlling behaviour. Allegedly, Ministry of Justice figures released in October 2016 showed that in ‘80% of family law cases at least one of the parties was a litigant in person’.

19.49 The article cited a ‘judiciary spokesman saying that the president of the family law division has acknowledged in public a pressing need to address the issue of abuse of men questioning their victims, and the wider issue of protecting vulnerable victims of domestic violence’.

8 See para 18.7.
10 Responding to revelations in the Guardian article, Cris McCurley, a family lawyer from the north-east of England, said: ‘I have worked on hundreds of cases and the direct cross-examination of victims by a perpetrator happens a lot. It is absolutely traumatising. We have got to get something in place to stop this, even if it means appointing a special advocate or even a law student to put the questions instead of the perpetrator.’
19.50 Our Review did not throw up a similar problem in this jurisdiction on anything like the scale that is being alleged in England and Wales. Nonetheless, with the increase in legal aid cuts, there is no reason to believe that at least in some instances a similar pattern may not emerge in our family courts. England and Wales, since 2014, has provided a Practice Direction 12J designed to protect mothers from direct cross-examination by violent perpetrators of abuse. We have included a copy of this at appendix 6 and we recommend the introduction of a similar practice direction in Northern Ireland in the near future in order to obviate similar problems surfacing.

19.51 This has been a problem that the President of the Family Division in England has been raising since 2014, calling for the need to reform the way in which vulnerable people give evidence in family proceedings. He has expressed particular concern about the fact that alleged perpetrators are able to cross-examine their alleged victims, something that, as family judges have been pointing out for many years, would not be permitted in a criminal court.

19.52 A Women’s Aid 2015 survey of survivors of domestic abuse in England and Wales found that a quarter of women had been directly questioned by the perpetrator.

19.53 The press articles depicted horrific stories of women subjected to lengthy abusive cross-examinations in hearings — for example, involving applications for contact with children.

19.54 In Northern Ireland The Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1999 (which mirrors s. 34 to 39 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999 in England) provides that the alleged perpetrator would be prohibited from cross-examining the alleged victim in person in the course of rape or other sexual offences before the criminal courts.

19.55 To allow a perpetrator of domestic abuse to cross-examine their victim in this manner is not only simply another tool used by a perpetrator to extend their control and abuse of vulnerable women but a clear disregard for the consequences and impact of abuse.

19.56 There is no distinction in policy terms between the criminal and family process in this regard. Logic strongly suggests that the same protection should be made available to women in the family jurisdiction as exists in the criminal jurisdiction. Why are we obliged to tolerate in family courts what would be forbidden in Crown Courts?

19.57 Countless attempts have been made in England to remedy this manifest abuse.11 Whilst the problem may not be as great in Northern Ireland because legal aid is currently more prevalent in the family courts here than in England, it is a problem that has surfaced in our discussions with the Women’s Aid Federation and particularly with district judges.

19.58 It is absolutely essential that steps are taken to address this. It does require legislation to ban cross-examination in the family courts on a parallel basis to that which now exists in the criminal courts under the 1999 legislation.

19.59 We observe that in February 2017 the Lord Chancellor, Liz Truss, announced proposals to introduce legislation in England to deal with the problem. Our strong recommendation is that similar legislation should be introduced forthwith in Northern Ireland.

19.60 An ancillary problem surfaced in the same context as that which we addressed earlier in this Report: the courts lack the special measures that are in place in the criminal courts providing victims with fair access to justice and protecting their safety and well-being when they are on the family court estate. In the first place, none of these suggestions will work unless the court is fitted out with the necessary facilities and have the necessary kit. The simple fact is that in the family courts they do not exist. In too many courts the only available special measure is a screen or curtains around the witness box. We do not have safe waiting rooms, the video links are completely inadequate in many instances and the family courts are often not up to an acceptable standard in terms of the facilities and kit available in the Crown Court.12

19.61 The proposals set out in this chapter received positive responses from all respondents. Certain matters deserve to be highlighted from those responses:

- A proposed information hub for personal litigants was highlighted on a number of occasions. The central point for this will be the NICTS but the Health and Social Care Board suggested that this should be cross-referenced to other relevant websites used by families, notably Family Support NI13 and the Children and Young People’s Strategic Partnership.14

- The first hearing in family proceedings involving personal litigants should be regarded as a case management opportunity. Time should be taken to advise as to the benefits of legal advice, the availability of pro bono in voluntary services and an outline should be given as to what is expected from all parties

12 We note that precisely the same problem exists in England as per Sir James Munby, ‘16th View from the President’s Chambers: Children and Vulnerable Witnesses — Where Are We Now?’, 19 January 2017.

14 http://www.cypsp.org/family-support-hubs/together with options to resolve the case outside as well as inside the court. Usefully, the Law Society recommended that consideration be given to a memorandum of understanding-style form to be signed by PLs at this review outlining how interaction with the court and legal representatives will take place. This would cover a range of issues where difficulties currently arise — for example, contacting the court, the nature and tone of the engagement, and lengthy emails to court offices.15

- A number of respondents were strongly in favour of further research and data collection on personal litigants — for example, the Northern Ireland Guardian Ad Litem Agency and the Law Society.

- Whilst any advice line/centre set up by NICTS for personal litigants would be extremely useful, it should work in collaboration with already existing services such as the Law Centre and the Children’s Law Centre.

- The proposal for an inquisitorial approach in certain cases elicited some concern from the Attorney General, who indicated that this might, if implemented, have the unintended and undesired result of making it more attractive to litigate without lawyers. The Attorney considered there was a strong argument for more judicial intervention in a wide variety of cases and would not wish to support an approach that confined this to cases without lawyers. The use of an inquisitorial approach should be an option for a judge if they assess that justice will be best served in this way irrespective of whether parties are legally represented or not. The Law Society, in discussions, whilst agreeing with the proposal when two parties are unrepresented, was cautious about invoking where one party was represented without their consent for precisely the same reasons as those outlined by the Attorney General.

19.62 A note of caution coursing through the responses by the professions on personal litigants was the genuine concern that the judiciary tends to indulge personal litigants to the disadvantage of those who are represented. The Belfast Solicitors’ Association, for example, was anxious to ensure that a dumbing-down of the legal process is not going to occur in order to cater for personal litigants, which would thereby make the whole system less effective, less efficient, lengthier and, therefore, more costly.

Recommendations

1. The first hearing in family proceedings involving personal litigants should be regarded as a ground rules setting or case management opportunity. The judge should take time to advise on such matters as

   - the benefits of legal advice and the availability of pro bono and voluntary services;

   - what is expected from all parties;

• time limits on applications and, indeed, submissions if necessary;
• skeleton arguments, including their suggested length;
• interlocutory concepts;
• what the case is essentially about;
• defining the issues as early as possible;
• options to resolve the case outside as well as inside the court;
• the outline of the process, including the nature of reviews, examination-in-chief, cross-examination, disclosure, the role of experts, timetabling, the role of the guardian ad litem etc. so that there are no unrealistic expectations; and
• the consequences of failure to comply with court orders. [FJ148]

2. All judges to be familiar with and guided by the current Equal Treatment Bench Book. They should be alert to personal litigants who may have a disability such as an autistic spectrum condition and be ready to make appropriate adjustments to procedures to accommodate this from the outset. [FJ149]

3. The use of an inquisitorial approach to be considered in appropriate cases where personal litigants are involved. A change in the rules should be implemented to facilitate this. [FJ150]

4. A renewed emphasis by the judiciary, the professions and other family law participants on use of appropriate, plain and readily understandable language in the Family Division. Courts should be proactively interventionist to ensure this occurs. [FJ151]

5. Where appropriate, courts to consider fixing specific time periods for hearings, provided there is some inbuilt measure of flexibility. [FJ152]

6. A booklet, similar to the existing booklet that is given to all personal litigants in the High Court, to be drawn up for all personal litigants in the Family Division highlighting, for example, opportunities for assistance. The current High Court booklet has been criticised by some personal litigants as employing insufficiently plain language, and this error must not be repeated. Paperwork and processes should be designed with the layperson in mind. The Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service should conduct a review of current forms to ensure they are appropriately plain and comprehensive for all court users. [FJ153]

7. A much-needed guide similar to the English publication, Sorting Out Finances on Divorce, intended to demystify this complex area, to be a task for the new Family Justice Board. [FJ154]

8. NICRTS to revisit its current website to establish a single authoritative website providing an online, objective information hub in family cases with an added emphasis given to support for vulnerable people. It should be more easily accessed. Vulnerable groups, such as people with mental health problems, should be signposted to appropriate services. [FJ155]

9. The online advice line and staffed centre to provide accessible and easy-to-understand guidance for personal litigants in the magistrates’ court, the county court and the High Court. [FJ156]

10. A move away from the conventional printed fact sheets and a more interactive approach adopted. [FJ157]

11. Consideration to be given to a central information hub located in specified court buildings — for example, Laganside in Belfast — which would be staffed by at least one person trained by NICTS specifically to assist personal litigants. [FJ158]

12. Both the Bar and the Law Society to draw up a joint protocol governing the approach to be adopted to personal litigants, ensuring best practice for working with laypeople is consistently provided. [FJ159]

13. Implementation in Northern Ireland of the equivalent of s. 194 of the Legal Services Act 2007, which allows pro bono cost orders to be made where a client represented pro bono wins their case. [FJ160]

14. Rigorous data-recording practices to be established across each tier of the family court system and in each geographical division. This should enable proper and periodic analysis of self-represented litigants, identifying whether there are any variations between courts or divisions. The data obtained would then inform whether a regional approach is appropriate or whether there are certain divisions or areas of practice that encounter most problems. [FJ161]

15. Provision of feedback from personal litigants in a formal questionnaire issued to each one at all tiers to measure their experience, together with any suggested improvements. [FJ162]

16. Court staff, lawyers and judges to receive training for dealing with problems with personal litigants. NICTS should consider training and delegating one staff member in each family court office to deal with such issues. [FJ163]

17. The results of the current research being undertaken in Northern Ireland on personal litigants to be specifically considered by the newly created Family Justice Board and further recommendations made. [FJ164]

18. The introduction of legislation similar to The Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1999 for the protection of witnesses from cross-examination by personal litigants in the Family Division. [FJ165]

19. The provision of special measures of adequate standard in all family courts. [FJ166]

20. The introduction of a practice direction in the Family Division in Northern Ireland similar to Practice Direction 12J in England and Wales. [FJ167]
Current position

20.1 The Children Order Advisory Committee (COAC) was established by the then Secretary of State for Northern Ireland with the following remit:

- to advise ministers on the progress of Children Order cases through the court system with a view to identifying the special difficulties and reduce avoidable delay; and
- to promote through family court business committees commonality of administrative practice and procedure in the Family Proceedings Courts (FPCs) and county courts and to advise on the impact on Children Order work of other family initiatives.

20.2 Over the years the committee has continued to meet regularly. Membership has increased on an ad hoc basis. Whilst the resulting breadth of experience contributes to valuable different perspectives, currently those who are responsible for implementing the Order in courts are under-represented around the table. The regional Court Users Committees are underutilised and frequently lacking in purpose or direction from COAC. The view was regularly expressed to us that COAC is increasingly being seen as a committee that is out of touch with the realities of practice.

20.3 There are frequent changes of representative members. While they bring fresh ideas and initial enthusiasm, there is no easy way for them to find out what has gone before. Consequently, the same issues recur every few years, similar work is done, no real change occurs, the work disappears into the ether and the issue is effectively shelved for resurrection at some underdetermined date in the future when the cycle starts again.

20.4 It is unclear if representative members are free to vote in accordance with their own personal views or should reflect the majority view of their group.

20.5 Communication is problematic — it is difficult for non-members to find out what is due for discussion or what has happened at meetings. There is limited interest in the annual reviews and The Children Order Advisory Committee: Best Practice Guidance needs updating and, indeed, is only intermittently invoked.

Discussion

20.6 Hence, there is a widespread view that COAC has outlived its original purpose and the time has come for change. A number of views from an array of sources echoed this view. Generally, the feeling is that it is too cumbersome and unwieldy in an era that demands some visionary thinking and clear directions outside sectional interests. We are satisfied that COAC should either be reformed or, preferably, replaced. There is a recognition that reliable management information (which is currently not available) is necessary to enable COAC to meet its current remit. In addition, COAC needs to reflect better the experience of those who are responsible for the day-to-day operation of The Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995. For example, there is currently only one representative at district judge level although the bulk of family proceedings work is done here. Similarly, there is no police representation (although we note this is to be addressed).

20.7 We recommend the establishment of a Family Justice Board (but not one identical to that created in England) to drive significant continuous improvement, review progress and consistency in the system, carry out research where necessary and suggest reform in the performance of the family justice system.

Other jurisdictions

REPUBLIC OF IRELAND

20.8 The Courts Service in the Republic of Ireland was established by an Act of the Oireachtas, the Courts Service Act, 1998. The service is supervised by a board established in accordance with s. 11 of the Act. The board has the power to establish committees, which may be standing committees or committees set up for particular functions.1

20.9 The board can appoint to a committee persons who are not members of the board but have a special knowledge and experience related to the purposes of the committee. The Family Law Development Committee is a standing committee of the board and has been in operation since the establishment of the Courts Service. The terms of reference of this body are instructive in the context of our proposals.

Terms of reference

1. Recommend appropriate reforms in administrative, judicial and quasijudicial structures in the management of family law cases to ensure that as far as possible, cases involving child related issues are prioritised, cases are listed according to priority, waiting times are mitigated and that the rules for same are clear for all users.

2. The promotion of alternative dispute resolution as a means of solving family law disputes.

3. Ensure the voice of the child is heard in family law proceedings on custody and access, by reports or other means, in an appropriate manner.

4. Encourage partnerships with key stakeholders and external agencies to deliver a better service for the citizen.

5. Assist the board and other committees of the Courts Service in outlining key elements of accommodation and facilities in family law courts, where opportunities to improve same arise.

6. The dissemination of information to the public on the family law courts including an improvement of the qualitative information available.

1 The power vested in the board to establish committees is set out in s. 15 of the Act.
7. Encourage practices which make use of the family courts more efficient, less costly, and relieve stress on the parties.

8. Promote education and seminars on family law.

9. Foster the publication of judgements of all benches suitably redacted to ensure confidentiality.

10. In consultation with the Committee for Judicial Studies, facilitate judges in specialised training on family law matters.

11. With board approval, make recommendations, where necessary on the reform of family law.

ENGLAND AND WALES

20.10 In England and Wales, a Family Justice Board (FJB) has been created with an independent chair chosen after a properly advertised selection process.

20.11 The judiciary’s role is that of an observer. A subcommittee of the Review Group had the privilege of discussing with Sir David Norgrove the workings of the FJB in England and Wales. The following matters arose:

- It is essentially a policymaking body. Its membership includes, for example, the head of the Children and Family Court Advisory and Support Service. Hence, the judiciary, preserving their independence, do not serve on it albeit the President of the Family Division attends as an observer and does make comments.

- As a policy committee, it does not have serving members of the profession on it.

- It has a small budget.

- Much emphasis is placed on the local family justice councils, which deal with problems at a local level, as opposed to the wider policy considerations of the FJB itself. Local problems do, of course, surface in local FJBs provided they have a general application.

- Sir David emphasised the importance of the body not being too unwieldy or large if one is to maintain focus and progress.

20.12 Our information is that there was very little cost incurred in setting up the FJB in England and Wales and the only cash cost was for the contract for the board’s chair and the recruitment exercise to recruit that chair. The latter was approximately £13,000 (advertising etc.) and the former was a daily rate of circa £400 per day for 20 to 30 days per year. There would, of course, be a necessity for secretariat costs but COAC already incurs secretariat costs.

20.13 There is also a Family Justice Council (FJC). It is a multidisciplinary body charged with more blue-skies thinking to advise the Government. Essentially, it deals with the quality of decision-making, leaving policy to the FJB. Amongst its tasks, for example, is drawing up guidelines to deal with parents who lack capacity.
Membership includes judiciary, members of the Government, psychiatrists, psychologists and paediatricians.

Discussion

20.14 There is no doubt that the structure of accountability in England and Wales is different from the proposed FJB for Northern Ireland. We believe there are two reasons for that. The first is that there is in place a management structure within the judiciary in England that ensures close monitoring of the reforms. In every new family court (since the amalgamation of the equivalent FPC and county court) there is a designated family judge, who is circuit judge level. They report to a High Court judge, who in turn reports to the President of the Family Division, Sir James Munby. A key management tool is the HM Courts and Tribunals Service care management system (CMS), which was designed by the judiciary and which we do not have in place. We do not have any similar management structure.

20.15 Secondly, a much smaller jurisdiction such as Northern Ireland does not need as complex a structure as exists in England, which includes local FJCs feeding into a main FJC and then an FJB with local FJBs. We simply need one body that is responsible for holding each stakeholder to account for the way it manages the services provided for children.

20.16 In the absence of a formal management system within the judiciary, the reforms that we recommend require a body with a chair who is of the highest calibre and is a person likely to carry weight with all stakeholders and government departments. They would be independent of all the stakeholders. They would have no vested interests, would come to the post with a different perspective perhaps from other stakeholders and be charged with providing strategic direction to design collaborative working to deal with matters of common concern. The concept of boards having an independent chair is widespread throughout all walks of life and the Family Justice Board should be no exception. The body would include, of course, family court judges, members of the professions and other stakeholders in the family justice system. Those persons would not be representative of the bodies from which they come but would be part of a collegiate enterprise working collaboratively to enhance the justice system. Our suggested model is closer to that of the Republic of Ireland (see its terms of reference above), with its Family Law Development Committee, save that we do not consider it needs to be statutory and it requires a distinguished independent chair. The aim, therefore, would be to revitalise the thrust and direction of family justice within Northern Ireland with a multidisciplinary body that, by virtue of its make-up, demanded to be heard.

20.17 The suggested FJB model for Northern Ireland, therefore, is intended to ensure operational accountability. There would, however, be no question of interference in judicial decision-making. Hence, we are of the view that COAC should be replaced by a Family Justice Board with such an independent paid chair with a fresh remit and fresh procedures.
Responses

20.18 With the exception of the Family Bar Association, every response on this topic strongly welcomed the setting up of a Family Justice Board with an independent chair.2 The responses are well summarised by a quotation from the comments of the Health and Social Care Board (HSCB):

The HSCB agrees with the report’s proposal that COAC has potentially outlived its original purpose and that time has come for change. This is reinforced by the need to take full account not only of the implications of the Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995 (and eventually of the proposed Children’s Legislation) but also in relation to the duties placed on the State by relevant international human rights instruments such as the ECHR, the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child and the UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities. Thus was accepted the recommendation of the creation of a new overarching Family Justice Board. The suggestion of an independent, paid chair would appear to offer the opportunity for a suitably qualified and experienced person to have both skills and time to give to the task of making this important Board function as effectively as possible.

20.19 Strong arguments were made in favour of having a permanent member of the voluntary and community sector rather than on a rotational basis. The problem here may be selecting the relevant person or persons from the voluntary sector rather than giving others an opportunity on the basis of a rotation. However, this is a matter that could be subject to further discussion.

20.20 The Law Society also stressed the continuing need for the family court business committees’ interdisciplinary meetings that currently occur. They provide opportunities for court practitioners to feed in from the coalface practical issues that arise in the family justice system. Incremental changes in resolutions of specific problems can be achieved — for example, change to the rules for the transfer of cases between court areas with the judge’s permission, resulting in considerable savings and cost for the transport of vulnerable children from venues to where families have relocated. The facility to review issues on a regional basis with five trusts operating in different ways and with court areas not aligned to the trusts makes this important in such a small jurisdiction. We agree entirely that the family court business committees should continue and will, of course, feed into the Family Justice Board.

20.21 The sole voice of dissent on the introduction of a new Family Justice Board was the Family Bar Association. In its response it indicated that it would wish to see the evidence that suggests that COAC is not working and that a board is needed rather than improving COAC in areas if there is evidence that there is a problem. This response ignores the overwhelming wealth of support for the new proposed structure and suggests that perhaps insufficient attention has been paid to voices

2 Welcoming responses came from, for example, the Law Society, the Belfast Solicitors’ Association, the NSPCC, the Northern Ireland Association of Social Workers, the Northern Ireland Lay Magistrates’ Association, NICCY, NIGALA, the Belfast Health and Social Care Trust and Detail Data, which is made up of a coalition of leading organisations that want to see improvements in the family law system for parents who are separating.
outside the family Bar. Helpfully, it suggests that any board membership should include the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Children and Young People and joins in the query of the rationale for a rotational member of the voluntary sector.

Recommendations

1. A Family Justice Board (FJB) to be set up with an independent chair recruited after a properly advertised recruitment exercise. The chair would be expected to be a person of outstanding and proven distinction and would be paid an appropriate daily rate with an expectation that they would work for 20 to 30 days per year. The chair should be genuinely independent of all stakeholders. [FJ168]

2. The terms of reference of the new FJB possibly to be along these lines:
   a. The board’s overall aim is to drive significant improvements in the performance of the family justice system, where performance is defined in terms of how effective (and efficient) the system is in supporting the delivery of the best possible outcomes for children who come into contact with it.

   b. The board will collectively work together to achieve its objectives. This principle of cross-agency working will be crucial in ensuring that the board achieves its overall aim of driving significant improvements in performance.

   c. In delivering against this aim, the board will have a particular focus on:
      • reducing delay in public and private law cases;
      • resolving private law cases out of court where appropriate;
      • building greater cross-agency coherence;
      • tackling variations in local performance;
      • carrying out research where appropriate;
      • supervising the provision of training; and
      • suggesting reform — for example, the implementation of suggestions for reform from bodies such as this Review Group.

   d. The detailed objectives for the board that will underpin its work might be:
      • to develop and monitor the implementation of a system-wide plan that sets out clear actions to be taken within, and particularly across, delivery agencies in order to achieve significant improvements in system performance;
      • to review and analyse whole system performance, based on evidence, and to report on this, including through an annual report;
      • to concentrate on outcome-based approaches, challenge poor performance and make recommendations on performance improvements to ministers, agency heads, local authorities and others;
• to develop, support and monitor local manifestations of the board (local family justice boards), which will oversee the operation of family justice in their areas;
• to identify, disseminate and monitor the implementation of local best practice and to help government to disseminate the latest research throughout the system;
• to identify processes by which research can be transmitted around the family justice system, enabling it to be reviewed and improved;
• to oversee the delivery of particular Family Justice Review recommendations — for example, on workforce, (excluding the judiciary), standards and the voice of the child; and
• in the longer term, to consider the case for more fundamental structural change to the family justice system and provide advice accordingly to the Government.

e. The board will at all times respect and act in a manner that protects judicial independence, both in relation to the judiciary generally and to individual judicial decisions. [FJ169]

3. The core membership of the Family Justice Board to be approximately eight to 10 persons with the right to set up subgroups and second relevant persons for defined purposes. Since the objective is to identify strategic goals and ensure accountability, the membership might be chosen from:
  • at least two family court judges;
  • the chief executive of the Northern Ireland Guardian Ad Litem Agency;
  • a senior representative of the health and social care trusts;
  • the chair of the Family Bar Association;
  • a member of the Law Society;
  • the chief executive of the Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service;
  • the chief executive of the Legal Services Agency; and
  • an academic member to advise the board about current research on issues affecting children and to have particular responsibility for multidisciplinary training.
  • Representatives of:
    ▪ children and young people care services and policies, Department of Health;
    ▪ children and family policy, Department of Health; and ▪ CR HELP civil law reform, Department of Finance.

On a rotational basis, the board should co-opt a member from the voluntary sector to ensure that a range of perspectives informs decision-making. [FJ170]

4. The Family Justice Board to have the power to set up subcommittees, co-opting persons from outside the board. [FJ171]

5. The Family Justice Board to provide annual reports on its work. [FJ172]
6. The minutes of the Family Justice Board meetings to be distributed widely and publicly online. [FJ173]

7. The Family Justice Board to have a secretariat and be given a modest budget to finance, for example, the drafting of practice guidelines, measured research, training manuals, expenses for attendance at seminars or conferences to which the chair or a nominated person might usefully attend or address etc. [FJ174]

8. Pending the setting up of this Family Justice Board, a number of steps to be taken to improve the Children Order Advisory Committee and to identify potential improvements to the Best Practice Guidance. [FJ175]

9. Our current family division liaison committee and family courts judicial committee (or, potentially, a single committee for the region akin to the Family Justice Council in England) to undertake the role of adviser to the Family Justice Board through its periodic reports to assist in the making of strategic decisions about the family justice system in Northern Ireland. [FJ176]
Conclusion

21.1 Throughout history, the law has had to respond to changes in the way people conduct their personal relationships. The present struggle for law to adapt to fresh developments in practices and beliefs concerning family law is no different from many other occasions in the past.

21.2 Predictions about the future of family law cannot be made with confidence. It is impossible to predict what it will look like in 20 years’ time. All this Review can hope to do is to shape the road ahead.

21.3 Law reform/review is always a complicated task, and family law reform is particularly sensitive due to the emotional nature of the subject matter it governs. There are few areas of law that affect so many people, and in such profoundly personal ways. Any review of family justice must reflect changing social patterns, emerging research evidence and the voice of stakeholder groups. Whilst perfection in law reform is undoubtedly a misnomer, respect for the law comes in part from understanding it, and is what underpins it. That we have attempted to achieve in this Review by advocating a fresh, multidisciplinary, outcome-based approach, centred on a combination of resolutions outside the court arena and the courts moving in most instances to be problem-solving fora.

21.4 However, it cannot be assumed that changing social norms and views on reform are uniform or even congruous or reconcilable. The difficulty with reform proposals based on appeasing some and providing concessions to others is that it can end up with continuing cycles of dissatisfaction, particularly because the messages conveyed by those recommending that reform and the messages received by members of the public affected by it are not necessarily the same.3

21.5 This Review and these recommendations are the product of the earnest endeavours of a wide array of judges, lawyers, departmental officials, professionals in the wider family justice system, voluntary sector participants and members of the public at large.

21.6 We were influenced by the responses to our preliminary report. Moreover, the construction of the debate that the Review triggered is not set in stone but is constantly in flux. The ideas that have been put forward can improve or indeed degenerate as the arguments unfold.

21.7 There is a difference between marginalising a debate and winning an argument. We are all familiar with this brand of cognitive dissonance. We do not so much believe in the sanctity of the present state of family law as decry the notion of stirring things up when the world works after its fashion the way it always has. Because attitudes to change are sometimes conflicted and contradictory, there is often no motivation to examine our current situation closely, which might lead us to the question of whether some of the attitudes that we currently hold are not at odds with real access to justice. In truth, the love of change can be a filtered affection.

21.8 We conclude as we started with a quotation from Francis Bacon: ‘He that will not apply new remedies must expect new evils; for time is the greatest innovator’. Just because one group of people in the past set the frame does not mean that others in the future cannot break the mould. If we fail to grasp this opportunity, new evils will beset us. If time is not to overtake us, we need these new remedies that we recommend.

21.9 One concept will remain unaltered, however. It is that there is no reason whatsoever why the family justice system in Northern Ireland should not be one of the most progressive and fairest in the world. With all the benefits of a small jurisdiction, and with the enormous talent at our disposal within the family justice system, we can quickly and effectively pilot new and creative ideas at minimum cost and be an example to other jurisdictions. I have discovered in my odyssey through the family justice system that we have without doubt extremely high-quality family judges, legal representation of the highest possible standards, experts of enormous distinction, civil servants unflinchingly dedicated to family justice and social services to compare favourably with any other jurisdiction. Far from being merely followers of fashion elsewhere, I am certain that we have in this jurisdiction the capacity to be leaders in the development of family justice and an example to the rest of the world.

Review of civil and family justice

Introduction
1. The Lord Chief Justice has commissioned a Review of Civil and Family Justice, to be led by a Lord Justice of Appeal.

2. Since the last comprehensive review of the civil justice system in Northern Ireland was completed in June 2000, the landscape within which the civil and family courts operate has changed substantially and there is a growing demand for the speedier resolution of business against a backdrop of declining resources. In addition, a judicially-led review of the Civil Justice System in Scotland was undertaken in 2007-2009, the outcome of which was published in September 2009 as the "Report of the Scottish Civil Courts Review", and there is a programme of civil justice reform planned for England & Wales, which is also being judicially led. These recent developments in GB have highlighted a number of potential opportunities, many of which should be capable of a local application. It is considered timely, therefore, to assess to what extent current arrangements in this jurisdiction are fit for purpose in a modern context.

3. The aim of the Review is to look fundamentally at current procedures for the administration of civil and family justice, with a view to:

   - improving access to justice;
   - achieving better outcomes for court users, particularly for children and young people;
   - creating a more responsive and proportionate system; and
   - making better use of available resources, including through the use of new technologies and greater opportunities for digital working.

4. The Review will proceed from the premise that the courts should be reserved for business that cannot be resolved through alternative means. It is recognised that additional capacity outside the courts would need to be created for such alternative approaches to be successfully implemented, and the Review will seek to provide an evidence base and clear rationale for potential new working practices that might better meet customer expectations in a modern justice system.
5. The outcome of the Review will be a report for the Lord Chief Justice to forward to the Department of Justice with recommendations designed to inform the direction of policy development in this area in the next Assembly mandate, building on any relevant findings in the report of the Access to Justice Review II, when published. This will highlight where legislative reforms would be required as well as the identifying “quick wins” that could be implemented on an administrative basis. The Department of Finance & Personnel and Department of Health, Social Services & Public Safety will be engaged, as appropriate, on matters relevant to their responsibilities.

Scope of the Review

6. The main areas to be covered by the review are as follows:

- the jurisdiction of the small claims and county courts
- the types of business that should be conducted within these jurisdictions
- the use of mediation and other forms of alternative dispute resolution, including on-line options (for example, online dispute resolution)
- opportunities to facilitate and provide support to unrepresented parties
- the workings of the family justice system
- the scale costs system and options for the proportionate recovery of costs
- opportunities for more proportionate use of evidence
- opportunities to streamline court procedures and improve case management, including for the transfer of business between court tiers and the potential for a single entry point for all non-criminal claims
- invocation of modern technology into the court process.

Duration

7. The Review will commence in September 2015 and be completed by no later than September 2017.

Methodology

8. A Review Group will be established to:

- examine current levels of business in the civil and family courts and how these are being managed;
- look at best practice and experience in other comparable jurisdictions;
- consider the adequacy of currently available data on civil and family caseloads;
- investigate the potential for closer collaborative working with voluntary sector providers;
- identify potential business improvements;
highlight areas where legislative reform is required;
- assess the potential equality implications of any proposals, with a view to ensuring there is no adverse differential impact for any s. 75 groupings; and
- identify training and development needs.

9. The Review will be substantially informed by the views of interested stakeholders. A Reference Group will be established to allow external stakeholder groups to provide their input and members of the public will be encouraged to contribute on the basis of their personal experiences.

10. The Review Group will, in consultation with relevant members of the Judiciary, develop a series of issues papers covering key themes within and across the various court divisions and tiers within the civil and family justice system. The issues papers will be shared with the Reference Group and made available online, as a means of providing the basis for an informed and inclusive debate. The Review Group will then produce an interim report, which will be made publicly available, and consider views on this before publishing its final report.

Governance arrangements

11. The Review Group will be chaired by Lord Justice Gillen and include the following membership:

- Mr Justice Horner
- The Recorder of Belfast
- The Presiding District Judge (Civil)
- The Presiding Master
- Gerry McAlinden QC, Bar Council nominee
- Arleen Elliott, Law Society nominee
- Laurene McAlpine, Department of Justice
- Laura McPolin, Department of Finance
- Eilis McDaniel, Department of Health
- Paul Andrews, Chief Executive of the Legal Services Agency
- Paula McCourt, Northern Ireland Courts & Tribunals Service
- Maura Campbell, Principal Private Secretary to the Lord Chief Justice

12. The Reference Group will include nominated representatives from:

- Advice NI
- Association of British Insurers
- Citizen’s Advice
- Chamber of Commerce
- Children’s Law Centre
- Federation of Small Businesses
- Consumer Council
- Family Mediation NI
- Health & Social Care Board
- Law Centre
- Law Society/Bar dispute resolution services
- Mediation NI
- NI Commissioner for Children & Young People
- Northern Ireland Council for Ethnic Minorities
- NIGALA
- NI Human Rights Commission
- NSPCC

13. The Office of Lord Chief Justice will provide the secretariat for the Review.

The Family Drug and Alcohol Court (FDAC)

What is it?

1. The FDAC is a Court Process for parents involved in public law proceedings when the impetus for intervention is parental substance misuse. Parents are given the option to engage with the service. The structure works within the Children Act 1993 and after being piloted in London has been extended to other areas in England. It is based on a US model.

2. The difference between this Court model and proceedings in Northern Ireland is:

   1) The Court has a specialist multi-disciplinary team attached to it containing a number of experts relevant to parental substance misuse.

   2) The assigned Judge essentially manages the multi-disciplinary team and programme of work for the parents. The Judge heads up fortnightly meetings with the parents and the team (without legal representatives) to manage problems and be updated about progress. The idea of these is to take a problem solving approach and to reduce the adversarial approach.

3. The Court essentially provides a forum for the parents capacity to change to be tested. There is an intense substances misuse package of opportunities from the multi-disciplinary team who also work closely with and co-ordinate outside agencies who provide relevant services. A tailor made plan is put together for each individual. The first two reviews are attended by legal representatives, thereafter they are fortnightly and without legal representation unless it is required for a specific issue.

4. At the first review the option is fully explained to parents for them to consider. If there is an interim care order application it is dealt with at that review. The Court orders disclosure of all papers to the specialist team who have a two week assessment period. After 3 weeks there is a second review for which an assessment report and proposed intervention plan is filed by the specialist team. If everyone is in agreement with it - in particular the parent - they sign the plan. Thereafter the fortnightly reviews commence, there is no legal aid for legal representation at these. Any contested issues (for example contact) are listed for a hearing and the legal representatives attend. Cases proceed to a final hearing in the ordinary way and there is an option to leave the scheme.
Analysis

5. The Nuffield Foundation have carried out an in depth evaluation of the FDAC and this paper will by no means to justice to the depth with which they have considered the issues. However, I have set out some of the interesting findings.

6. In comparison with the control group, parents in this Court structure were much more likely to stop substance misuse - 40% of Mothers did compared to 25% in the control group and 25% of Fathers did compared to 5% of the control. The rate of reunification and stopping substance misuse was higher as well - 35% of Mothers achieved this compared to 19% in the control group.\(^1\) There are a number of relevant factors to consider in relation to these statistics, first there is a selection process for suitable cases to go through the process. Secondly, the access to services would appear to be significantly better.

7. The Nuffield Foundation found that parents were offered more help in the FDAC, 95% of Mothers were offered substance misuse services compared to 55% in the control group.\(^2\) The quality of the programme was identified as a benefit, the frequency and intensity, regular testing, motivating approach and therapeutic support were key factors.

8. The process was no quicker than traditional proceedings and some concern has been raised about how this court model could fit within the timescales suggested for care order proceedings in England (26 weeks). Children took longer to be rehabilitated to parents than the comparison sample which is explained as purposeful delay.\(^3\) However, the process raises issues about how the tension between reducing delay and dealing with parental problems which require some time to address can be relieved.\(^4\)

9. The Court structure has received awards and accolades since inception. Recently Sir Justice Munby is quoted by the BBC as saying:

   I consider FDAC as one of the most important and innovative developments in public family law in decades ... I am a strong supporter and believe that its combination of therapy, offered by the multi-disciplinary team, and adjudication and direction using the authority of the court is the right approach for parents suffering from addiction ...The process delivers better outcomes for the children and the parents subject to it and achieves this in a manner which respects the humanity of the parents.\textsuperscript{5}

10. The success of the project in London is reflected by the fact it is now being rolled out throughout England.

Considerations in introducing a similar a system

11. There are some headline grabbing features of this system which at first blush seem to be the reason for its success, for example they promote the fact that they have judicial continuity and "lawyerless" reviews. I would suggest that judicial continuity is not a problem within Northern Ireland. The benefit of the reviews may not be the fact that lawyers are absent, rather the benefit may in fact be the frequency with which they are held and the fact that the Judge is the chair. This introduces a closer level of accountability for the professional services involved with the substance cessation plan. The frequency would remove delay in dealing with problems which arise.

12. The benefit of having a tailor built, multi-disciplinary team dedicated to the Court and specifically constructed to deal with a particular problem - substance misuse- is no doubt one of the stand out features of this model. Providing clients with access to the services they need, obtaining funding for those services and engaging experts are areas most practitioners would describe as frustrating and a cause of delay. In this model they have those services, tailored to their needs and instantly accessible. However, the funding and co-operation of the Trusts would be necessary for this and liaison with them in terms of the cost, availability and willingness to provide would be required. It is this feature of the Court which is perhaps most different to our current structure and procedure. Unfortunately, the Nuffield evaluation did not include a cost analysis for the additional services.

13. The system offered modest legal savings (£682/family) but much greater savings in terms of the shorter care placements (£4,000/child) and savings on experts (£1,200/case). The cost of the team per family is £12,000.\textsuperscript{6}

\textsuperscript{5} http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/uk-31512532

Northern Ireland. Street drugs may represent less of an issue than alcohol or prescription drugs for example. Research would need to be conducted within Northern Ireland to identify the specific areas of need in relation to substance misuse.

15. Location may be another factor to consider, the Court may need to be able to provide services for sufficient numbers of families to make it viable. The intensity of the process and nature of the services mean it is unlikely to be feasible for people to travel to make use of it. Therefore research would be required to see if it is a sustainable model.

Conclusion

16. The evidence would suggest there are significant benefits to this model in terms of parent/child outcomes. There is a large volume of analysis of this court model which has already been conducted. If it is being considered, we would have the benefit of that analysis which would allow a tailored approach for Northern Ireland. There could be an element of cherry-picking to benefit from the experience of the English Courts and fit it within our own system. Significant research and liaison with social services would be required in considering taking this forward.

The Scottish System

EXPLANATION OF THE SYSTEM

1. Children’s proceedings are governed by the Children (Scotland) Act 1995. In many Sheriff’s courts there is an assigned family sheriff.

2. A proposal was explored in the Scottish Civil Court Review that a pursuer ought to be able to choose whether or not to bring such matters before a sheriff or a district judge. It was proposed that on lodging the initial writ (the process by which proceedings are began in Scotland as opposed to the C1 in Northern Ireland) the pursuer may specify a preference. The case would then be allocated and a defender who disagrees with the pursuer’s choice of venue may raise this at the first case management hearing.\(^7\)

3. Both the procedure and terminology used in these proceedings somewhat differs from Northern Ireland. The basic sequence of such proceedings is as follows:

- Consult with client and investigate legal aid eligibility
- Draft pursuer’s (applicant’s) application to the court. This is known as the initial writ for which there is a standard format.
- The initial writ is sent to the Sheriff Clerk for warranting. (Birth certificates should be included)
- When warranted the writ is returned and a service copy should be served on each defender (respondent). Service can be carried out by a Sheriff Officer or recorded delivery.
- The defender has 21 days from the date of service to respond.
- If the defender lodges a notice of intention to defend the court will send a G6 form which largely contains timetabling arrangements.
- If a notice of intention to defend is not lodged within 21 days the court will grant decree by default. (OCR 33.37)
- There is then an “adjustment period” where parties adjust their pleadings.
- A child welfare hearing will almost always be fixed. This is generally 21 days or more after the defences are lodged, unless the Sheriff feels that it should be sooner.
- There is then an “options hearing”. The pursuer must lodge two copies of the pleadings no later than two days before the options hearing. OCR 9.11 and 9.12 provide the procedural rules.

\(^7\) Scottish Civil Court Review, Chapter 3, A New Case Management Model
• At the options hearing the following courses may be taken.
  1. Continuation (adjourned) for a maximum of 28 days.
  2. Proof (evidential hearing)
  3. Debate (a hearing on a specific point of law)
  4. Proof before answer (a hearing on a specific point of fact)

4. It is apparent that such proceedings in Scotland are intended to be tightly managed and focussed on achieving a resolution between the parties without the need for a proof to take place. Case management hearings take place before a proof to help streamline the hearing and see if resolution can be reached at that stage.

5. Like with proceedings under the Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995 the welfare principle is the courts paramount consideration under the Scottish legislation. Adherence is also given to the no order principle. Private law applications regarding parental responsibility, residence and contact etc. are governed by s. 11 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995. In determining such matters the court “shall regard the welfare of the child concerned as its paramount consideration and shall make any such order unless it considers that it would be better for the child that the order be made than that none should be made at all.”8 The wishes and feelings of the child are also taken into account, like in Northern Ireland, consistent with the child’s age, maturity and understanding.9

6. During the course of proceedings concerning children people can be appointed to safeguard the child’s interests and / or provide a report on matters affecting the child. Such appointments can be statutory or common law. Reporters may be appointed under Rule 33.21 of the Ordinary Cause Rules where no formal requirements as to qualifications and experience are set out. It is submitted that guidance in relation to qualification and experience is also inadequately dealt with under s. 40 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995. This provision is very vague in that it prescribes only the qualifications of a reporter shall be such as the Secretary of State may prescribe and that the secretary of state may make regulations in relation to their functions. Unlike in Northern Ireland Scotland does not have a centralised Guardian ad Litem Agency (in relation to public law proceedings) or trust employed Court Children’s Officer (in relation to private law proceedings). Further, various different names are given to these individuals such as “reporters” and “curators ad litem”. As a result of this there is no

8 Section 11(7)(a) Children (Scotland) Act 1995
9 Section 11(7)(b) Children (Scotland) Act 1995 prescribed form and content for reporting nor is there any fee structure. These reporters tend to be solicitor or sometimes social workers.

7. Like in Northern Ireland litigants in person are becoming more common in family proceedings. Litigants in person may apply to the court to have a “lay assistant” alongside them. Lay assistants are equivalent to a McKenzie friend and like in Northern Ireland they are not permitted to speak on their behalf in court. The role of the lay assistant is limited to advice and assistance.\(^\text{10}\)

8. Scottish family law judge Lord Brailsford has developed a draft protocol for family law cases in the Court of Session. The aim of the draft Protocol is more effective case management of family law cases, being introduced in the wake of the report of the Scottish Civil Courts Review. This is not yet part of the rules of court or a practice note, however, the draft protocol has been piloted since October 2012 and is now widely used where possible. The difficulty in fully following same appears to lie in the fact that the necessary work is not funded in legally aided cases. It should be noted that this draft protocol was devised in relation to the Court of Session, not the Sheriff’s court.\(^\text{11}\)

9. This draft protocol in places appears to be modelled towards the English system whereby evidence in chief is by affidavit rather than oral. This is clearly intended to reduce expense and the amount of court time required, however, this is controversial among practitioners. Clark and Wylie questioned this proposal stating that “while perhaps reducing the length of the proof, is the process now front-loaded, particularly in relation to the preparation of affidavits, so that the clients total legal costs are in fact higher?”\(^\text{12}\)

10. Like in Northern Ireland parties are increasingly being encouraged to mediate. A report by the National Audit Office in March 2007 found that family breakdown cases resolved through mediation are cheaper and quicker to settle, and deliver better outcomes.\(^\text{13}\)

\(^{12}\) Ibid.

ANALYSIS (PROS & CONS) AND POTENTIAL IMPLICATIONS OF EXPORTING SUCH A SYSTEM

11. While the Scottish system in relation to private law matters is not dissimilar from that in Northern Ireland given that the welfare principle remains the courts paramount consideration it is submitted that this system should not be exported into the Northern Irish courts.

Being able to choose whether or not the case should be assigned to a sheriff or district judge:

Advantages:

- Offers flexibility as it allows the pursuer to choose the court in which to litigate (para 89)
- This proposal was aimed at providing judicial continuity as the case would be allocated to a particular sheriff or district judge (para 87)

Disadvantages:

- Enabling the pursuer to choose the court in which to litigate might be used to gain tactical advantage particularly where there is an inequality in the parties’ resources. For example, where an experienced family sheriff was some distance from where the parties reside.
- Offering such a choice may simply give rise to another dispute between the parties.

The Scottish system of appointing reporters/curators/safeguarders in order to protect the interests of children in proceedings:

Advantages

- Helps to ensure that the child’s interests are protected
- Such individuals help identify and narrow the issues in dispute
- Provide information to assist the court in hearing the case

Disadvantages:

- There are no formal requirements as to their qualifications/experience
- No consistent practice for identifying suitable candidates for appointment
- There are no requirements under Rule 33.21 as to the form and content of the reporter’s report.
- Reports have sometimes been found to be of poor quality, very lengthy and not always well focussed on the relevant questions. (Paragraph 103 Scottish Civil Court Review).
There are no set parameters for reporter’s fees. Where a solicitor is appointed they will normally charge on a per hour basis at their usual charging rate the fees of which, where one or both parties are legally aided, are usually paid by the Scottish Legal Aid Board.

12. The difficulties with the approach in Scotland were highlighted in the case of NJDG v JEG (2012) SC (UKSC) 293. This was essentially a contact and residence dispute, however, such was the acrimony between the parties and the delay in the system that the proof ran for 52 days taking over one year to complete. The Sheriff issued a decision more than 5 years after proceedings had commenced and cost an estimated £1 million in legal aid.

13. In this matter the sheriff allowed the second respondent curator to become a party to proceedings. The curator attended the proof, conducted cross examinations and gave evidence himself. This involved the curator cross examining witnesses about events and conversations which he had been part of and him removing his gown to enter the witness box and give evidence. All of this was able to occur despite the fact that the Ordinary Cause Rules concerning curators ad litem such as 33.16(9) (b) and 33A 16(9) (b) are drafted on the basis that a curator who becomes party to proceedings will instruct representation. The Supreme Court were instructed that this occurred was due to difficulties with legal aid.

14. It is submitted that the concern expressed by Lord Reed in his judgment with regard to the lack of clarity and consistency about what is expected of such individuals is well founded. In Northern Ireland the appointment of Guardians ad litem and Court Children’s Officers are regulated by public bodies resulting in higher standards, consistency and an established fee structure. Further, this makes their role in the process much more transparent and regulated and appropriate training, guidance and monitoring can be provided.

Proposal in relation to evidence in chief being by affidavit

Advantages

- Time saving
- Focussed and succinct
- Witnesses less stressed/ nervous

14 NJDG v JEG (2012) SC (UKSC) 293 at [37] and [40]
Disadvantages

- The other side do not know what questions were asked to elicit the information contained therein
- Cost saving to the client likely to be negligible given the considerable extra preparation and drafting time.
- Will put a gloss on the witness’s words which would not be present in oral evidence giving the court less opportunity to see how the witnesses present.
- Concern that it will cause proceedings to become “front loaded”\textsuperscript{15}

15. It is submitted that evidence in chief by affidavit is unlikely to be appropriate in all circumstances and that there is a genuine concern that such an approach would not save time or costs and would result in the loss of an opportunity for the court to see and hear the presentation of witnesses.

DIVORCE

16. In order to grant a divorce the court must be satisfied that the marriage has broken down irretrievably\textsuperscript{16} or that an interim gender recognition certificate under the Gender Recognition Act 2004 has, after the date of the marriage, been issued to either party to the marriage.\textsuperscript{17} This ground can be proven by:

- Adultery\textsuperscript{18}
- Unreasonable behaviour\textsuperscript{19}
- Living apart for one year – if living apart for one year and both parties agree to the divorce a court will accept this as proof of irretrievable breakdown of the marriage.\textsuperscript{20}
- Living apart for a period of 2 years continuously- you can apply for a divorce without your partner’s agreement.\textsuperscript{21}

17. This differs somewhat from the position in Northern Ireland under the Matrimonial Causes (Northern Ireland) Order 1978 whereby the petitioner is required to demonstrate either 2 years separation with consent\textsuperscript{22} or 5 years separation without consent.\textsuperscript{23}

\textsuperscript{17} S (1)(b) of the Divorce (Scotland) Act 1973
\textsuperscript{18} S 1(2)(a) of the Divorce (Scotland) Act 1973

\textsuperscript{21} s 1(2)(e) of the Divorce (Scotland) Act 1973
\textsuperscript{22} Art 3(2)(d) of the Matrimonial Causes (NI) Order 1978
\textsuperscript{23} Art 3(2)(e) of the Matrimonial Causes (NI) Order 1978
18. Similar to Northern Ireland, legal aid is available depending on income and capital and how reasonable the Scottish Legal Aid Board thinks it is to give you help. In some cases parties might have to pay some of the legal costs back out of money or property acquired from the ancillary relief, this is known as “clawback”. This is similar to the statutory charge system in Northern Ireland.

19. There is a simplified/ do it yourself procedure in place. This can be used in cases where:

- You are applying for divorce/dissolution because of the irretrievable breakdown of your marriage/partnership based on one year separation with consent or two years separation without consent, or because of the issue of an interim gender recognition certificate;
- There are no children of the marriage/partnership under the age of 16;
- There are no financial matters to sort out;
- You are not, and there are no signs that you spouse or civil partner are not able to manage his or her affairs because of mental illness, personality disorder or learning disability;
- There are no other court proceedings under way which might result in the end of your marriage / civil partnership.24

Where the simplified procedure can be used by parties there is considerable cost saving:

- Fee payable from 22 September 2015 in relation to simplified divorce:
  Application for simplified divorce/dissolution of civil partnership - £111
  Service by sheriff officer in a simplified divorce/dissolution of civil partnership - £11 plus sheriff officer's fee

- Fee payable from 22 September 2015 in relation to ordinary divorce:
  Application for ordinary divorce/dissolution - £147
  NID/reponing note (ordinary divorce/dissolution) - £147
  Motion or minute (ordinary divorce/dissolution) - £47
  Record (ordinary divorce/dissolution) - £111
  Fixing Proof (ordinary divorce/dissolution) - £53

---

Each day or part day of proof, debate or hearing in summary application/misc. application - £223
Initial lodging of affidavits in undefended ordinary divorce /dissolution - £65
Appeal to Sheriff Principal - £111
Initial writ (ordinary) - £94
NID/reopening note (ordinary) - £94
Caveat - £35
Record - £111
Fixing proof - £53
Each day or part day of proof, debate or hearing in summary application/misc. application - £223
Initial lodging of affidavits in undefended family action - £65
Motion or minute - £47
Appeal to Sheriff Principal - £11125

- Northern Ireland Court fees

Personal Petitioner Interview - £50
Lodging Petition - £200
Setting down High Court - £300
Setting down County Court - £250
Application to make Decree Nisi Absolute/ Make conditional order final - £7526

ANALYSIS (PROS & CONS) AND POTENTIAL IMPLICATIONS OF EXPORTING SUCH A SYSTEM

The simplified procedure

Advantages

- Cheaper
- More straightforward
- Saves court time and resources
- Less stressful for parties

Disadvantages

- Undermines the seriousness of divorce

In appropriate circumstances this simplified procedure could be made available in Northern Ireland where parties are divorcing on either 2 or 5 years separation in order to save costs and court time.

The Dutch System - Online Dispute Resolution & Compulsory Mediation

Part 1- Online Dispute Resolution- Rechtwijzer 2.0

1. Rechtwijzer is an online-based dispute resolution platform that supports litigants through the process of divorce and consumer issues. This article will focus on the issue of divorce.

2. The program was developed by HiiL (an advisory and research institute for the justice sector in the Hague) along with the Dutch Legal Aid Board and the University of Tilburg and was supported by the Dutch Ministry of Security and Justice. It had the support of the judiciary, government and bar.

3. Rechtwijzer 1.0 was first launched in 2006 and guided its users through a triage phase after which they would find relevant self-help tools and referrals to legal professionals.

4. Rechtwijzer 2.0 it takes the model a step further. It does not simply signpost and direct the litigant but rather it provides a means of resolution itself. It is largely inspired by eBay’s hugely successful resolution centre (resolving over 60 million small consumer disputes annually).\(^\text{27}\)

5. At the first stage, the system gathers personal information from the user and invites the other party to engage through an online dialogue. The two parties can then negotiate a separation agreement with this tool. If there are issues that cannot be resolved then the parties can request online mediation. Alternatively (or after the mediation if it was unsuccessful) the parties can obtain an online adjudication. The final step is a neutral legal review.

6. At each point flat fees are charged. The mediation, adjudication and reviews are provided by mediators and lawyers for a lower rate than tradition services. For lower income users the process is subsidised by legal aid. It is certainly a much more cost effective means for a separated couple to obtain a divorce and as it is designed to be low content per page, it does seem to be user friendly.\(^\text{28}\)

\(^{28}\) Dutch Justice Innovation Puts People First: Realizing the Potential of On-Line Dispute Resolution. Nsrlp 31/07/14
7. Although law is constantly evolving, necessitating the need for constant updating of the software, Rechtwijzer 2.0 is designed to ultimately be self-financing. Once this is the case, the savings to the legal aid pocket will be staggering.

Application in Northern Ireland?

8. The first point worth noting is that there would have to be legislative changes to allow the Rechtwijzer model to be adopted here in Northern Ireland. Although of course the church and state are separate, it is undeniable that the church remains politically influential in Northern Ireland. We only have to look at the topics of liquor licensing, homosexual marriage and the recent Asher’s Bakery case to see the weight religion carries in society. It is unlikely that an online “click for divorce” system will be met without significant opposition by the public and politicians. It may well be seen as belittling an important legal and personal decision.

9. Practically speaking the translation of the Dutch model to Northern Ireland would be hard to facilitate. In the Netherlands, like in Northern Ireland, there is one ground for divorce: the irretrievable breakdown of the marriage. However there is no need to evidence this ground in the Netherlands. In Northern Ireland irretrievable breakdown has to be proved in at least one of five ways; Two years separation with consent, five years separation, adultery, unreasonable behaviour and desertion. This would make it difficult, particularly in the fault-based grounds, to process the divorce electronically.

10. There is a section on Rechtwijzer 2.0 dealing with domestic violence. The user answers a series of questions and if domestic violence is considered an issue then he or she is redirected to sources of help. This does not seem like an adequate response. Often victims of domestic abuse do not wish or feel able to do anything about it. This is an area in which the role of a solicitor or barrister goes beyond being the voice of the client in court. A face-to-face encounter with the client is necessary to build up trust and necessary to spot any indications of domestic abuse. The virtual experience simply does not cut it. There is also the worry that the partner is with the user during the online process and there is pressure to answer the questions in a certain way.

11. Not everyone is computer literate and even those who are might find an interactive process would exacerbate an already stressful situation. If a user had someone

29 Digital Delivery of Legal Services to People on Low Incomes From Online Information To Resolution. Roger Smith. December 2014 p7 assisting them through the process, they may not necessarily be as honest, as many of the questions are personal.

12. It is true that if a Rechtwijzer model were adopted here in Northern Ireland, after the initial start up expense, it would result in huge savings for the legal aid fund. However, it could in effect create a two-tier system in which the rich can afford proper legal representation while the poor will have no other option but go through the online process.30

13. There are of course advantages to the Rechtwijzer 2.0 model other than the long term savings to the legal aid pocket. It is possible that the litigants will feel a greater sense of control over the process and indeed it may remove some long term acrimony between the parties if they feel they have reached the outcome together. Although this model would obviously reduce the need for lawyers input, they still are necessary for mediation and arbitration so their role is much more focused.

Part 2- Mediation in Holland

14. Hodges et al provides that there is a strong national culture of settlement and ADR in the Netherlands.31 This is a reflection of the Dutch legal doctrine that although people should have access to justice, litigation should only be available as an ultimum remedium (final option) after all other options have been exhausted.32

15. The Dutch Judiciary has been promoting alternative dispute resolution since the nineties. The four main goals for ADR are out of court resolution of disputes, attaining the best quality or the most effective way of settling disputes; the realization of various forms of access to justice that make the parties primarily responsible for dispute resolution; and lastly, less pressure on the judicial system.33

16. Until somewhat recently, Dutch law contained no specific mediation provisions. This changed with the implementation of the EU Mediation Directive (2008/52/EC)34. In November 2012 Parliament passed a law implementing the Mediation Directive which aims to promote the use of mediation and to ensure that parties having recourse to mediation can rely on a predictable legal framework.35

17. The Dutch Judiciary have encouraged mediation by making court directed mediations free of charge for 2 and a half hours. General mediation is covered by legal aid. In certain circumstances parties are obliged to negotiate before they are permitted to litigate.

18. The ministry of Justice conducted an investigation into the suitability for mediation in court hearings and after a successful pilot mediation scheme in five courts, every court now has a mediation facility.

Mediation in Northern Ireland?

19. There are many advantages to mediation. Firstly, mediation is cheaper than litigation. Litigation costs can reach values grossly disproportionate to the value of the claim, which also frustrates judges and wastes court time. This is a point that does not only apply to civil law but also family. There is much unnecessary litigation in relation to Ancillary Relief, even for relatively small aspects of the case, such as dividing up the contents of a home. This can often hike up costs incurred and draw out the legal process.

20. Mediation gives parties a greater control over the proceedings. They often feel like they have made a joint decision which works for both parties, which will make it more likely the agreement will last. With mediation you can turn back anytime, and you can have anything you do not understand explained. You can choose to preserve relationships with the other party, and you have control over the remedies which are more flexible to your needs.

21. Mediation is more flexible than litigation as it can provide many different outcomes.
As noted by Genn, mediation is often considered capable of producing a “win/win” situation, rather than a “win/lose” situation as with litigation. Mills notes how mediation can give a party proper “closure” and he considers how the Mulcahy report lays out outcomes which mediation can provide that litigation cannot:

admission of responsibility; apology; explanation; and reassurance that what happened was not in vain.\footnote{Mills 68 citing mulcahy et al, Mediating Medical Negligence Claims: an Option for the Future (HMSO, 2010)}

22. Mediation is confidential and anything disclosed is on a without prejudice basis which encourages parties to be frank and open with each other.

23. Mediation is reconciliatory in nature. The Law Society of NI’s Dispute Resolution Scheme notes that the aim of ADR is to “preserve the best of any pre-existing relationship and good-will between the parties; to ensure that they can continue to work together in commercial and human relationships.”

24. However, that emphasis on a “pre-existing relationship and goodwill” might be the stumbling block for compulsory mediation. It is very often the case that if a family matter is before the court, the relationships between the parties has broken down to such an extent that they cannot agree anything. This would make it nearly impossible for a mediator to have any meaningful contribution. Similarly, it can be the case that a Court Children’s Officer in Northern Ireland will not become involved in a case if there is not enough of a level of agreement between parties. Compulsory mediation in many family cases would only slow down the process, and it may become a box that needs to be ticked, so to speak.

25. Furthermore, unsuccessful mediation would inevitably result in litigation so in fact, more costs would be incurred. Mediation has been critiqued as “soft justice,” nothing more than an additional layer of costs in the litigation stream and a process fundamentally at odds with the role of the court as a decision maker.”\footnote{Speech by the Honourable Warren K. Winkler Chief Justice of Ontario, “Access to Justice, Mediation: Panacea or pariah?” (2007)} Admittedly, however, mediation may serve to distil the issues into one or two net disputes, which would save time and money.

26. Mediation is not suitable in all cases, particularly when there is an imbalance of power between the parties (as is often the situation in family matters). An example would be a case involving domestic violence. Baruch Bush and Folger refer to this scenario as the “oppression story” of mediation. They consider critics who believe that mediation has become dangerous- that it “increases the power of the strong over the weak,” allowing the strong party to coerce and manipulate the weak. Furthermore these critics believe that as the mediator has to maintain a neutral persona, they can be relived of the responsibility to prevent this problem.\footnote{Genn 89-90 citing R.A. Baruch Bush and J.P. Folger, The Promise of Mediation: The Transformative}
27. Mediators are unregulated and there are no requirements or qualifications needed in order to become a mediator. This means that anyone can become a mediator and there is no guarantee the mediator will be trained or competent. In ancillary relief cases particularly, there are numerous complex issues such as life assurance policies, properties in various titles, state and private pensions and company stocks and shares, state benefits and tax credits. An inexperienced mediator with no knowledge of accounts or company law could not spot any potential problems a settlement could offer a party, for example tax implications. It would be irresponsible to agree a way forward without sound legal advice in most cases. Often in ancillary relief matters, parties do not always come to court honestly and try to hide assets and income sources. It is necessary to have a legal representative to spot these potential issues.

28. Mediation is not legally binding so problems can arise with enforcing the outcome. In contrast, a court judgment is always binding.

29. Although it is considered advantageous to reduce litigation, it has a negative impact on our civil justice system for the long term. Lord Rodger stated that the court system is, “the best vehicle for achieving justice,” and without it, “individuals and businesses (would) lack guidance on all kinds of everyday situations.” Without trials, and clear rule-making through the courts, people would struggle to avoid legal risk.

30. In the right kinds of disputes, mediation can help parties resolve disputes more quickly and cheaply than litigation, and it can re-build relationships and provide creative remedies, in a way a court simply cannot. However, mediation has its problems and care needs to be taken that the vital importance of litigation is not overlooked. Mediation should certainly be considered in suitable cases but making it mandatory would not be a sensible option. Indeed it could amount to a breach of the ECHR. Dyson L.J explained in the Court of Appeal case of Halsey that “…it seems... likely that compulsion to ADR (including mediation) would be regarded as an unacceptable constraint on the right to access to the court and, therefore, a violation of article 6(ECHR).”

Approach to Conflict (Jossey-Bass, 2005) 9-19

47 Halsey v Milton Keynes General NHS Trust [2004] EWCA Civ 576
48 paragraph 9
A Study of Family Law Systems in Australia, New Zealand and Canada

1. The purpose of this study is to consider the family law systems in various common law jurisdictions in order to inform potential reform in the Northern Irish system. The study evidences that all three jurisdictions are in a period of reform. Reforms have been implemented in Australia in 2006, in New Zealand in 2013, and are being considered in Canada.

1. Australia

2. A series of changes were introduced to the Australian family law system in 2006. This included changes to the Family Law Act 1975 through the Family Law Amendment (Shared Parental Responsibility) Act 2006 and changes to the family relationship services system.

3. The policy objectives of the 2006 changes to the family system were to:

1. help to build strong healthy relationships and prevent separation;
2. encourage greater involvement by both parents in their children's lives after separation, and also protect children from violence and abuse;
3. help separated parents agree on what is best for their children (rather than litigating), through the provision of useful information and advice, and effective dispute resolution services; and
4. establish a highly visible entry point that operates as a doorway to other services and helps families to access these other services.\(^\text{49}\)

4. The changes to the family service system included the establishment of 65 Family Relationship Centers (FRCs) throughout Australia, the Family Relationship Advice Line (FRAL) and Family Relationships Online (FRO), funding for new relationship services, and additional funding for existing relationship services.

5. The legislative changes comprised four main elements that:

- require parents to attend family dispute resolution (FDR) before filing a court application, except in certain circumstances, including where there are concerns about family violence and child abuse;
- place increased emphasis on the need for both parents to be involved in their children's lives after separation through a range of provisions, including the introduction of a presumption in favor of equal shared parental responsibility;

• place greater emphasis on the need to protect children from exposure to family violence and child abuse; and
• introduce legislative support for less adversarial court processes in children’s matters.\(^50\)

6. In 2006, the Australian Institute of Family Studies (AIFS) was commissioned by the Australian Government to undertake a large scale evaluation of the impact of the 2006 changes. The evaluation has involved the collection of data from 28,000 people involved or potentially involved in the family law system. This evaluation provides a more extensive evidence base about the use and operation of the family law system in Australia (and arguably internationally) than has previously been available and has continued to affect their ongoing legal policy and practice developments.

Evaluation

7. The 2009 evaluation concluded that the reforms have had a positive impact in some areas and a less positive impact in others.\(^51\) The evaluation concluded that there is more use of relationship services, a decline in children’s cases being commenced in the courts, and evidence of a move away from court being used as a first resort with post-separation relationship problems. It evidenced that a significant proportion of separated parents were able to sort out their post-separation arrangements with minimal engagement with the formal court system. It also evidenced that FDR was assisting parents to work out parenting arrangements. It found that about two-fifths of parents who used FDR reached agreement and did not proceed to court.

8. However there were significant concerns surrounding FDR, many clients had concerns about violence, abuse, safety, mental health problems and substance misuse. The encouragement of using non-legal solutions, and the general expectation that parents should attempt FDR, resulted in FDR occurring in some cases where there were very significant concerns about violence and safety.

9. There were also further unintended negative consequences. A majority of lawyers perceived that the reforms have favored fathers over mothers and parents over children. There was concern among a range of family law system professionals that mothers are disadvantaged in a number ways, including in relation to negotiations

\(^{51}\) ibid.
over property settlements. There is an indication that there may have been a reduction in the average property settlements allocated to mothers.\footnote{ibid.}

2. \textbf{Canada}

10. Increasing problems have been identified in the Canadian family law system. As noted by Carol Rogerson, ‘Ensuring access to justice is one of the main challenges currently confronting the family law system.’\footnote{Carol Rogerson, ‘Canada: A Bold and Progressive Past but an Unclear Future’ in Elaine Sutherland (ed.), The Future of Child and Family Law: International Predictions (2012) 81} There are stringent restrictions on civil legal aid funding, and large numbers of lower and middle class Canadians are left unable to fund lawyers to resolve their disputes. As stated by Rogerson, ‘The result is an increasingly dysfunctional system characterised by clogged court dockets, increasing numbers of unrepresented litigants and growing frustration with a system that is both costly and increasingly perceived as ineffective.’\footnote{ibid.}

\textbf{Reform?}

11. Reform is being considered in Canada, with the setting up of the Action Committee on Access to Civil and Family Justice, and its recently published report, 'Meaningful Change for Family Justice: Beyond Wise Words'\footnote{Action Committee on Access to Justice in Civil and Family Matters, ‘Meaningful Change for Family Justice: Beyond Wise Words’ (April 2013) <http://www.cfcj-fcjc.org/sites/default/files/docs/2013/Report%20of%20the%20Family%20Law%20WG%20Meaningful%20Change%20April%202013.pdf> accessed on 9 October 2015} which states that ‘Canadian do not have adequate access to family justice.’\footnote{ibid.} However whilst the government has taken some steps in this direction, no significant reform has taken place. As noted by Rogerson, ‘the appropriate direction of reform remains contentious and the extent to which the system can truly be fixed without a major commitment of public resources- an unlikely outcome in times of fiscal constraint- remains in doubt.’

3. \textbf{New Zealand}

12. New Zealand’s family law system underwent significant reform with the Family Dispute Resolution Act and Regulations 2013 which have been described by the then Justice Minister Judith Collins as the most significant change to New Zealand’s family justice system since the establishment of the Family Court in 1981. The reforms are based on a review of the Family Court carried out by the New Zealand Ministry of Justice from 2011-2014. The reforms relate mostly to the Care of Children Act 2004, which involves issues relating to post-separation care and contact, and account for 40% of applications to the Family Court in New Zealand. They aim to reduce stress on families and children by avoiding as far as possible, the delays, conflict and expense that court proceedings can entail. They aim to provide better information to the public via a new website for example, to introduce new court forms, such as a standardised questionnaire affidavit to establish the facts in a case. They also try to strengthen the Family Court’s response to domestic violence.57

Key features of the reforms include:

(1) Expanding Parenting Through Separation (PTS) which is a free information programme that teaches parents about the effects of separation on children, and parenting skills to reduce children’s stress during separation. Participation has been made mandatory for many applicants before they proceed to the Family Court.

(2) Introducing a new Family Dispute Resolution (FDR) service for resolving parenting matters outside of court. An approved FDR mediator assists parents to identify the matters in dispute, facilitates discussion, and helps them to reach agreements that focus on the needs of their children. FDR is mandatory for most parties prior to commencing Care of Children Act 2004 proceedings. However in cases where it is inappropriate, such as urgent cases, or where there are safety risks, then the parties can go directly to Court. The cost of FDR is fully subsidised for the estimated 60% of parties who meet an eligibility test. For those not eligible, the cost is likely to be less expensive than getting a lawyer and proceeding to a full court hearing.

(3) Providing low income parents eligible for out of court support with up to four hours of legal advice prior to FDR through the Family Legal Advice Service (FLAS). They may also be provided with up to three hours of Preparatory Counselling to help them make the most of FDR.

(4) Introducing a simplified three track system to support people to navigate parts of the Court independently. Applications to the Court are allocated to a ‘track’ depending on its complexity:

a. ‘Without Notice’ Track- Urgent applications to the Court, for example, where violence is alleged, are automatically allocated to the Without Notice track. This ensures vulnerable people exposed to violence and children needing protection have immediate access to the Court

b. Simple Track- Applications to the Court for single-issue matters. For example, contact arrangements for children. This track is designed so that the parties are able to represent themselves, without the need for a lawyer.

c. Standard Track- Applications to the Court for multiple or more serious issues, for example, an application for day-to-day care or permission to take children to live overseas are allocated to the Standard track. This track is designed so parties are able to represent themselves, without the need for a lawyer, for most of the process. If matters are not resolved, the case moves on to a formal hearing where lawyers are present.

(5) Domestic Violence Changes. The maximum penalty for breaching a protection order has been increased from two years to three years imprisonment. The definition of domestic violence has been broadened to include financial and economic abuse, such as denying or limiting access to financial resources. Non-violence programmes have been made safer and more effective and there are wider powers for people to be directed to attend an assessment in addition to a non-violence programme. There is also an increased onus on providers to report on the outcomes of non-violence programmes and to identify any ongoing safety concerns about those who have attended programmes.58

The Need for Evaluation

13. It is difficult to evaluate the success of the reforms in New Zealand as they have been implemented so recently. Steps have been taken to develop projects in order to evaluate the new policy. It has been recognised following family law reforms in both Australia and the UK, that there is a need for a commitment to invest in evaluation of the reforms. As stated by Gluckman,

‘Given the large fraction of the public purse that is expended in the social policy domains, quality evidence to support appropriate policy development and formal evaluation of desired impacts is critical. Evaluative science and intervention research is particularly important in the implementation of social policy because the reality is that the nature of human systems is such that it is not possible to predict with certainty the direct effect and spill-over consequences of any one intervention.”

Conclusions

14. The complexities with developing an effective family law system are evidenced through the problems all of the discussed jurisdictions are facing. There is no right answer as to the best way to deal with separated families.

15. There is a general trend of a move away from the court and towards out-of-court methods of resolution. Both Australia and New Zealand now require that parties engage in FDR before court proceedings can be commenced. As discussed, evaluations have proved that FDR has been quite successful in Australia, with two-fifths of parents who used FDR reaching agreement and without the need to proceed to court. However, there were serious difficulties with FDR being used in the wrong circumstances, with concerns about FDR being used in situations where violence, abuse, safety, mental health problems and substance misuse were prevalent.

16. Another key development in both Australia and New Zealand has been the acknowledgement that the new reforms must be thoroughly evaluated in order for policy to develop positively. The 2009 evaluation by the Australian Institute of Family Studies has proved very useful in evaluating the 2006 reforms, and suggesting further ways for the family law system to be developed. It is suggested that there is a need for formal evaluation evidence with any reform in Northern Ireland, as currently there is little data to evidence the effectiveness of the Northern Irish family courts.

Appendix 4

In New Zealand, the Care of Children Act 2004 at s. 46O provides as follows:

46O Judge may direct a party to undertake a parenting information programme

(1) At any time after an application has been made to the court for a parenting order under section 48, a Family Court Judge may direct one or more parties to the application to attend a parenting information programme.

(2) However, the Family Court Judge may not make a direction under subsection (1) in respect of a party if that party has undertaken a parenting information programme within the preceding 2 years …

47B Mandatory statement and evidence in applications

(1) This section applies to—

(a) an application for a parenting order under Section 48.

(b) an application to vary a parenting order under Section 56.

(2) The application must include a statement made by or on behalf of the applicant for the order—

(a) that the applicant has undertaken a parenting information programme within the preceding 2 years; or

(b) that the applicant is not required to undertake a parenting information programme because—

(i) the applicant is unable to participate effectively in a parenting information programme; or

(ii) the applicant is making the application without notice.

(3) Evidence in support of a statement made under subsection (2)(a) or (b)(i) must be included in the application.

(4) A Registrar may refuse to accept an application if the Registrar considers that the evidence provided does not adequately support the statement.
Appendix 5

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE BUNDLES PD – PD 27A

Memorandum by the President of the Family Division

1. PD27A imposes a 350-page limit (PD 27A, para 5.1) and spells out (para 4.1) the fundamental principle that “The bundle shall contain copies of only those documents which are relevant to the hearing and which it is necessary for the court to read or which will actually be referred to during the hearing.” Compliance with these requirements is still fitful.

2. One matter which is not regulated by PD27A is the length of individual documents. I urged restraint in Re L [2015] EWFC 15, [2015] 1 FLR 1417, paras 21-22. I am not conscious that this has had much effect. I wonder whether the time has therefore not now come to impose page limits for certain types of documents, which will be mandatory in all cases “Unless” – cf PD27A, para 5.1 – “the court has specifically directed otherwise, being satisfied that such direction is necessary to enable the proceedings to be disposed of justly.”

3. I accordingly suggest for consideration the insertion in PD27A of a new para 5.2A, as follows:

   “Unless the court has specifically directed otherwise, being satisfied that such direction is necessary to enable the proceedings to be disposed of justly, any of the following documents included in the bundle shall be limited to no more than the number of sheets of A4 paper and sides of text specified below:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Document</th>
<th>Limit</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Case summary</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Statement of issues</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Position statement</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chronology</td>
<td>10</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Skeleton argument</td>
<td>15</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>List of essential reading</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Witness statement or affidavit</td>
<td>20</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(exclusive of exhibits)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Expert’s or other report</td>
<td>40</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Care plan</td>
<td>10”</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

4. I ask three questions: (i) is this desirable; (ii) if so, should length be controlled by a page count or a word count; and (iii) if by page count, are the suggested figures appropriate?
5. As a separate matter, I further suggest that the final words of PD27A, para 4.3, be re-numbered 4.3A and amended to read (additional words show in italic):

“Copies of all authorities relied on must be contained in a separate composite bundle agreed between the advocates. Unless the court has specifically directed otherwise, being satisfied that such direction is necessary to enable the proceedings to be disposed of justly, the bundle shall not contain more than 10 authorities. Where a case is reported in a law report which contains a headnote, such a report shall be used and transcripts (including transcripts on BAILII) shall not be used. Attention is drawn to the Practice Direction dated 24 March 2012.”

The need for this is indicated by Holman J’s judgment in Seagrove v Sullivan [2014] EWHC 4110 (Fam), paras 21-22.

TRANSPARENCY IN THE FAMILY COURTS

PRACTICE GUIDANCE issued on 16 January 2014 by SIR JAMES MUNBY, PRESIDENT OF THE FAMILY DIVISION

The purpose of this Guidance

1. This Guidance (together with similar Guidance issued at the same time for the Court of Protection) is intended to bring about an immediate and significant change in practice in relation to the publication of judgments in family courts and the Court of Protection.

2. In both courts there is a need for greater transparency in order to improve public understanding of the court process and confidence in the court system. At present too few judgments are made available to the public, which has a legitimate interest in being able to read what is being done by the judges in its name. The Guidance will have the effect of increasing the number of judgments available for publication (even if they will often need to be published in appropriately anonymised form).

3. In July 2011 Sir Nicholas Wall P issued, jointly with Bob Satchwell, Executive Director of the Society of Editors, a paper, The Family Courts: Media Access & Reporting (Media Access & Reporting), setting out a statement of the current state of the law. In their preface they recognised that the debate on increased transparency and public confidence in the family courts would move forward and that future consideration of this difficult and sensitive area would need to include the questions of access to and reporting of proceedings by the media, whilst maintaining the privacy of the families involved. The paper is to be found at: https://www.judiciary.gov.uk/publications/the-family-courts-media-access-and-reporting/

4. In April 2013 I issued a statement, View from the President’s Chambers: the Process of Reform, [2013] Fam Law 548, in which I identified transparency as one of the three strands in the reforms which the family justice system is currently undergoing. I said:

“I am determined to take steps to improve access to and reporting of family proceedings. I am determined that the new Family Court should not be saddled, as the family courts are at present, with the charge that we are a system of secret and unaccountable justice. Work, commenced by my predecessor, is well underway. I hope to be in a position to make important announcements in the near future.”

5. That applies just as much to the issue of transparency in the Court of Protection.

6. Very similar issues arise in both the Family Court (as it will be from April 2014) and the Court of Protection in relation to the need to protect the personal privacy of children and vulnerable adults. The applicable rules differ, however, and this is something that needs attention. My starting point is that so far as possible the same rules and principles should apply in both the family courts (in due course the Family Court) and the Court of Protection.

7. I propose to adopt an incremental approach. Initially I am issuing this Guidance. This will be followed by further Guidance and in due course more formal Practice Directions and changes to the Rules (the Court of Protection Rules 2007 and the Family Procedure Rules 2010). Changes to primary legislation are unlikely in the near future.

8. As provided in paragraph 14 below, this Guidance applies only to judgments delivered by certain judges. In due course, following the introduction of the Family Court, consideration will be given to extending it to judgments delivered by other judges (including lay justices).

The legal framework

9. The effect of section 12 of the Administration of Justice Act 1960 is that it is a contempt of court to publish a judgment in a family court case involving children unless either the judgment has been delivered in public or, where delivered in private, the judge has authorised publication. In the latter case, the judge normally gives permission for the judgment to be published on condition that the published version protects the anonymity of the children and members of their family.

10. In every case the terms on which publication is permitted are a matter for the judge and will be set out by the judge in a rubric at the start of the judgment.

11. The normal terms as described in paragraph 9 may be appropriate in a case where no-one wishes to discuss the proceedings otherwise than anonymously. But they may be inappropriate, for example, where parents who have been exonerated in care proceedings wish to discuss their experiences in public, identifying themselves and making use of the judgment. Equally, they may be inappropriate in cases where findings have been made against a person and someone else contends and/or the judge concludes that it is in the public interest for that person to be identified in any published version of the judgment.
12. If any party wishes to identify himself or herself, or any other party or person, as being a person referred to in any published version of the judgment, their remedy is to seek an order of the court and a suitable modification of the rubric: Media Access & Reporting, para 82; Re RB (Adult) (No 4) [2011] EWHC 3017 (Fam), [2012] 1 FLR 466, paras [17], [19].

13. Nothing in this Guidance affects the exercise by the judge in any particular case of whatever powers would otherwise be available to regulate the publication of material relating to the proceedings. For example, where a judgment is likely to be used in a way that would defeat the purpose of any anonymisation, it is open to the judge to refuse to publish the judgment or to make an order restricting its use.

Guidance

14. This Guidance takes effect from 3 February 2014. It applies

(i) in the family courts (and in due course in the Family Court), to judgments delivered by Circuit Judges, High Court Judges and persons sitting as judges of the High Court; and

(ii) to all judgments delivered by High Court Judges (and persons sitting as judges of the High Court) exercising the inherent jurisdiction to make orders in respect of children and incapacitated or vulnerable adults.

15. The following paragraphs of this Guidance distinguish between two classes of judgment:

(i) those that the judge must ordinarily allow to be published (paragraphs 16 and 17); and

(ii) those that may be published (paragraph 18).

16. Permission to publish a judgment should always be given whenever the judge concludes that publication would be in the public interest and whether or not a request has been made by a party or the media.

17. Where a judgment relates to matters set out in Schedule 1 or 2 below and a written judgment already exists in a publishable form or the judge has already ordered that the judgment be transcribed, the starting point is that permission should be given for the judgment to be published unless there are compelling reasons why the judgment should not be published.
SCHEDULE 1

In the family courts (and in due course in the Family Court), including in proceedings under the inherent jurisdiction of the High Court relating to children, judgments arising from:

(i) a substantial contested fact-finding hearing at which serious allegations, for example allegations of significant physical, emotional or sexual harm, have been determined;

(ii) the making or refusal of a final care order or supervision order under Part 4 of the Children Act 1989, or any order for the discharge of any such order, except where the order is made with the consent of all participating parties;

(iii) the making or refusal of a placement order or adoption order under the Adoption and Children Act 2002, or any order for the discharge of any such order, except where the order is made with the consent of all participating parties;

(iv) the making or refusal of any declaration or order authorising a deprivation of liberty, including an order for a secure accommodation order under section 25 of the Children Act 1989;

(v) any application for an order involving the giving or withholding of serious medical treatment;

(vi) any application for an order involving a restraint on publication of information relating to the proceedings.

SCHEDULE 2

In proceedings under the inherent jurisdiction of the High Court relating to incapacitated or vulnerable adults, judgments arising from:

(i) any application for a declaration or order involving a deprivation or possible deprivation of liberty;

(ii) any application for an order involving the giving or withholding of serious medical treatment;

(iii) any application for an order that an incapacitated or vulnerable adult be moved into or out of a residential establishment or other institution;

(iv) any application for a declaration as to capacity to marry or to consent to sexual relations;
any application for an order involving a restraint on publication of information relating to the proceedings.

18. In all other cases, the starting point is that permission may be given for the judgment to be published whenever a party or an accredited member of the media applies for an order permitting publication, and the judge concludes that permission for the judgment to be published should be given.

19. In deciding whether and if so when to publish a judgment, the judge shall have regard to all the circumstances, the rights arising under any relevant provision of the European Convention on Human Rights, including Articles 6 (right to a fair hearing), 8 (respect for private and family life) and 10 (freedom of expression), and the effect of publication upon any current or potential criminal proceedings.

20. In all cases where a judge gives permission for a judgment to be published:

(i) public authorities and expert witnesses should be named in the judgment approved for publication, unless there are compelling reasons why they should not be so named;

(ii) the children who are the subject of the proceedings in the family courts, and other members of their family, and the person who is the subject of proceedings under the inherent jurisdiction of the High Court relating to incapacitated or vulnerable adults, and other members of their family, should not normally be named in the judgment approved for publication unless the judge otherwise orders;

(iii) anonymity in the judgment as published should not normally extend beyond protecting the privacy of the children and adults who are the subject of the proceedings and other members of their families, unless there are compelling reasons to do so.

21. Unless the judgment is already in anonymised form or the judge otherwise orders, any necessary anonymisation of the judgment shall be carried out, in the case of judgments being published pursuant to paragraphs 16 and 17 above, by the solicitor for the applicant in the proceedings and, in the case of a judgment being published pursuant to paragraph 18 above, by the solicitor for the party or person applying for publication of the judgment. The anonymised version of the judgment must be submitted to the judge within a period specified by the judge for approval. The version approved for publication will contain such rubric as the judge specifies. Unless the rubric specified by the judge provides expressly to the contrary every published judgment shall be deemed to contain the following rubric:

“This judgment was delivered in private. The judge has given leave for this version of the judgment to be published on condition that (irrespective of what is contained in the judgment) in any published version of the judgment..."
the anonymity of the children and members of their family must be strictly preserved. All persons, including representatives of the media, must ensure that this condition is strictly complied with. Failure to do so will be a contempt of court.”

22. The judge will need to consider who should be ordered to bear the cost of transcribing the judgment. Unless the judge otherwise orders:

(i) in cases falling under paragraph 16 the cost of transcribing the judgment is to be at public expense;

(ii) subject to (i), in cases falling under paragraph 17 the cost of transcribing the judgment shall be borne equally by the parties to the proceedings;

(iii) in cases falling under paragraph 18, the cost of transcribing the judgment shall be borne by the party or person applying for publication of the judgment.

23. In all cases where permission is given for a judgment to be published, the version of the judgment approved for publication shall be made available, upon payment of any appropriate charge that may be required, to any person who requests a copy. Where a judgment to which paragraph 16 or 17 applies is approved for publication, it shall as soon as reasonably practicable be placed by the court on the BAILII website. Where a judgment to which paragraph 18 applies is approved for publication, the judge shall consider whether it should be placed on the BAILII website and, if so, it shall as soon as reasonably practicable be placed by the court on the BAILII website.
Glossary

ADR see alternative dispute resolution

affidavit
A written statement made in the name of a person (based on facts within his/her own knowledge) who voluntarily signs it (in the presence of an authorised person), having sworn or affirmed that it is true.

alternative dispute resolution (ADR)
Ways of attempting to resolve disputes so as to avoid litigation. Mediation is the primary form of ADR.

ancillary relief (AR)
In the context of matrimonial proceedings is where a party to proceedings for a divorce, nullity or judicial separation seeks an order for financial provision.

AR see ancillary relief

Brussels IIa
Regulation (EC) No 2201/2003, also called Brussels IIa or II bis, is a European Union regulation on conflict of law issues in family law between member states, in particular those related to divorce, child custody and international child abduction. The regulation concerns the jurisdiction responsible for parental responsibility, including the access to the child of the other parent. Jurisdiction is generally referred to the courts connected to the child’s habitual residence. The regulation also specifies procedures regarding international child abduction but does not take precedence over the Hague child abduction convention (to which all EU member states are parties).

C1, C1AA and C2 forms

C1 This is the form of document by which an application is begun for any of the court orders available under The Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995 and it should contain relevant information about the circumstances of the child/children the subject of the proceedings.

C1AA This is a supplemental information form to be completed by applicant and respondent.

C2 This document is for applications for one or other of the following: leave (permission) to commence proceedings (this is required in situations where the applicant does not have an automatic right to come before the court to seek an order); for an order or directions in existing family proceedings; and to be joined as, or cease to be, a party in existing family proceedings.

CAFCASS see Children and Family Court Advisory and Support Service
Chancery Division
Part of the High Court of Justice (the other divisions being the Queen’s Bench Division and Family Division). Further information on the work it undertakes can be found here:
www.courtsni.gov.uk/en-GB/AboutUs/RCJ/Pages/Royal%20Courts%20of%20Justice%20Customer%20Information.aspx#Chancery

Children and Family Court Advisory and Support Service (CAFCASS)
This is the public body in England and Wales that performs the functions of the Guardian Ad Litem Agency in this jurisdiction. CAFCASS is independent of the courts, social services, education and health authorities and all similar agencies. It looks after the interests of children involved in family court proceedings. Officers advise the courts on what they consider to be in the best interests of individual children.

Citizens Advice (formerly Citizens Advice Bureau)
A charitable organisation with offices throughout the country at which the public can receive free advice and information on civil legal, and other, matters.

Civil Justice Council (England and Wales)
An advisory public body established under the Civil Procedure Act 1997. It is responsible for overseeing and coordinating the modernisation of the civil justice system. Further information on its role can be found here:
https://www.judiciary.gov.uk/related-offices-and-bodies/advisory-bodies/cjc/

contempt of court
Failure to comply with the order of a court or an act of resistance or insult to the court or judge.

county court
Deals with civil (non-criminal and non-family) matters. Types of civil case dealt with in the county court include:
- individuals and businesses trying to recover money they are owed;
- individuals seeking compensation for injuries, or damages for breach of contract or other wrongs; and
- landowners seeking orders that will prevent trespass, or for possession at the end of a tenancy.

county court judges
Judges in Northern Ireland who primarily sit in the county court, Crown Court and Family Care Centre.

DFJ see designated family judge designated family judge (DFJ)
Every Family Care Centre has a DFJ who is responsible for it and for other family courts in the area that have been designated as hearing family work. DFJs are county court judges. They are responsible for leading all levels of the family judiciary other than High Court judges at the courts for which they have responsibility, and for ensuring the efficiency and effectiveness of the discharge of judicial family business at those courts.

discovery
A process whereby the parties to court proceedings disclose to each other all documents in their possession, custody or power relating to issues in those proceedings.

dissolution
The act of dissolving or ending a marriage.

district judges
Full-time judges who deal mainly with the majority of cases in the county court. They are assigned on appointment to a particular circuit and may sit at any of the county court hearing centres or district registries of the High Court on that circuit.

early neutral evaluation
A process, provided both privately and on occasion by the court, in which an early indication is given of what the outcome might be if the matter were to be finally adjudicated in court.

European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms
An agreement between the members of the Council of Europe to identify and protect the human rights of its members. It led to the establishment of the European Commission for Human Rights and the European Court of Human Rights. The United Kingdom is a signatory to the convention and has enshrined the rights afforded by it in United Kingdom domestic law by virtue of the Human Rights Act 1998. Art. 8 of the convention provides a right to respect for everyone’s ‘private and family life, his home and his correspondence’, subject to certain restrictions that are ‘in accordance with law’ and ‘necessary in a democratic society’ and this article is often in play in family proceedings.

European Court of Human Rights
The international court, sitting in Strasbourg, which interprets the European Convention on Human Rights. Only when every legal process has been exhausted in his or her own member country may an individual bring a case to the European Court of Human Rights.
Family Division
Part of the High Court of Justice along with the Queen’s Bench Division and the Chancery Division. Further information can be found at: www.courtsni.gov.uk/en-GB/AboutUs/RCJ/Pages/Royal%20Courts%20of%20Justice%20Customer%20Information.aspx#Family

guardian ad litem
A person, normally a social worker in the Northern Ireland Guardian Ad Litem Agency, appointed by the court to protect the interests of a child who is the subject of a public law application in a Children Order case for the duration of that case. A guardian ad litem is so called because ad litem means ‘for the suit’ or, more loosely, ‘for the purpose of the proceedings’ and serves to distinguish the office from the role of legal guardian whose duty extends to protecting a child generally and is not confined to the lifetime of a set of proceedings.

Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction (also known as the Hague child abduction convention)
The principal object of this convention, aside from protecting rights of access to children, is to protect children from the harmful effects of cross-border abduction (and unlawful retainments) by providing a procedure designed to bring about the prompt return of said children to the state of their habitual residence. It is based on a presumption that, save in exceptional circumstances, the wrongful removal or retention of a child across international boundaries is not in the interests of the child and ensures that any determination of the case of custody or access is made by the most appropriate court having regard to the likely availability of relevant evidence. The principle of prompt return serves as a deterrent to abduction and wrongful removals.

High Court judges
Judges who are assigned to one of the three divisions of the High Court — the Queen’s Bench Division, the Family Division and the Chancery Division. In Northern Ireland, High Court judges usually sit in Belfast. They hear serious criminal cases, important civil cases and appeals in the High Court and assist the Lord Justices to hear appeals in the Court of Appeal.

injunction/injunctive relief
An order or decree by which a party to proceedings is required to do or refrain from doing a particular thing.

Judicial Studies Board for Northern Ireland
Established in 1994, the board’s membership consists of at least one representative from every judicial tier and a legal academic. The board is chaired by a Lord Justice of Appeal. The Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service provides secretarial support for the board and finances its work directly from the NICTS budget.
The board is to provide suitable and effective programmes of practical studies for full- and part-time members of the judiciary and to improve upon the system of disseminating information to them. In order to protect judicial independence and in particular to ensure that sectional interests are not brought to bear on the judiciary through the training events, the board is judge-driven.

The board seeks to facilitate a variety of training events each term (presentations, workshops etc.), designed to meet the needs of judiciary at all levels.

jurisdiction
- The power/competence of a court to hear and deal with certain proceedings or application.
- The territorial or other limits within which the judgments or orders of a court can be enforced or executed.

Law Society of Northern Ireland
The professional association that represents and governs the solicitors’ profession for the jurisdiction of Northern Ireland.

Some judgments, orders or agreed settlements put up to the court give the parties liberty to apply, implying a right to apply to the court for the purpose of working out, putting into effect or enforcing the judgment, order or settlement. Liberty to apply is implied in any non-final order or a primary judgment.

An individual, company or organisation that is a party to legal proceedings but not represented by lawyers.

Lord Chief Justice
The judge who is the head of the judiciary in Northern Ireland.

Lord/Lady Justice
A judge of the Court of Appeal.

maintenance pending suit
After a petition for divorce, judicial separation or nullity has been filed, one party may apply to the court for an order that the other party make payments for his or her maintenance. This is known as maintenance pending suit and the order will expire at the conclusion of the proceedings.

Malthusian gap
Rev Thomas Robert Malthus (1766–1834) posited a theory that, as population growth is ahead of agricultural growth, there must be a stage at which the food supply is inadequate for feeding the population. The difference between demand and the inadequate supply is what is meant by the phrase ‘Malthusian gap’, which is used metaphorically in the context of this Report to refer to the growth in demand for support services in relation to the resources that government can provide for these purposes.

Mareva injunction
Where debt proceedings are taken against a party, the court may grant a Mareva injunction to prevent the defendant from removing assets from the jurisdiction before the trial of the matter.

Master
A Master is a judicial officer in the High Court who exercises the jurisdiction of a High Court judge in chambers and whose role is concerned primarily with interlocutory or procedural matters such as applications ancillary to the substantive proceedings and case management. Masters also have competence to hear an increasing number of cases in circumstances where a High Court judge is not required.

A person under the age of 18 years. This is also how child is defined under The Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995.

NICTS see Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service

A divorce in which the dissolution of a marriage does not require a showing of wrongdoing by either party.

Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service (NICTS)
An agency within the Department of Justice sponsored by the access to justice directorate. The role of the NICTS is to:
- provide administrative support for Northern Ireland’s courts and tribunals;
- support an independent judiciary;
- provide advice to the Minister of Justice on matters relating to the operation of the courts and tribunals;
- enforce civil court judgments through the Enforcement of Judgments Office;
- manage funds held in court on behalf of minors and patients;
- provide high-quality courthouses and tribunal hearing centres; and
- act as the Central Authority for the registration of judgments under certain international conventions.

Official Solicitor
Refers to the Official Solicitor to the Court of Judicature of Northern Ireland appointed under s. 75 of the Judicature (Northern Ireland) Act 1978 whose principal purpose is to represent the interests of certain persons who are under a legal disability (that is, patients). The Official Solicitor normally acts as a controller for a patient when there is no one else available to assume this role. Aside from acting as a controller, the Official Solicitor’s work includes the following:
• providing legal assistance to the High Court’s Office of Care and Protection in connection with the estates of patients where someone other than the Official Solicitor is appointed as controller;
• representing the interests of persons under a legal disability, including children, in family or other civil proceedings; and on the papers
• taking responsibility for other miscellaneous matters (such as consent to medical treatment cases) where the court feels that the assistance of the Official Solicitor would be an advantage.

A matter thus decided or determined is one where the decision maker arrives at his or her decision after reading the relevant papers/submissions and without hearing any oral submissions or evidence.

online court
See chapter 6 of this Report for further details in relation to the proposed online court for Northern Ireland.

online dispute resolution
The use of technology to assist the resolution of disputes between parties.

perfect
To perfect a court order is to bring about the completion of all that the order requires.

petition
A formal statement addressed to a court by which the petitioner ‘prays’ (asks for) remedy or relief. Thus, for example, proceedings for divorce and bankruptcy are commenced by petition.

Practice Direction (PD)
Practice directions accompany and amplify rules of court and give practical advice on how to apply and act in accordance with the rules themselves.

pre-action protocols
These set out how the courts expect parties to behave prior to commencement of any claim. They are primarily designed to assist the parties to resolve disputes without recourse to starting proceedings in court.

pro bono work
Advice given or professional work undertaken voluntarily and without payment as a public service.

proving service
Before a court proceeds to hear and deal with a matter it may require the party bringing the proceedings to prove, by oral or documentary evidence, that the papers initiating those proceedings and giving notice of the date and time of the court were duly served on the other party where that party is not before the court on the date of hearing.

Queen’s Bench Division
One of the three divisions of the High Court together with the Chancery Division and Family Division. Further information can be found here: http://www.courtsni.gov.uk/en-GB/AboutUs/RCJ/Pages/Royal%20Courts%20of%20Justice%20Customer%20Information.aspx#Queens

The statutory rules of court that govern the procedures of the courts to which they apply.

summons
A document issued from a court office or a judicial authority requiring the person to whom it is addressed to attend before a judge or other officer of the court. A summons may be issued to a person to answer a charge or complaint against him or her, or to require someone to attend court to give evidence.

UNCRC see United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child

The United Kingdom is a signatory to this convention (which identifies and enshrines certain minimal rights for children) and has therefore bound itself by its provisions. The UNCRC does not have force of domestic law in the way that the European Convention on Human Rights does. The provisions of the UNCRC inform and influence the approach taken in the family courts.
A note of gratitude

I would like to thank the following people, who have been tireless in their commitment to this task, unendingly assiduous in addressing the issues and selflessly met and consulted for hours on end in order to complete this work well ahead of schedule.

Family justice subcommittee

I wish to add a special note of appreciation to the members of the family justice subcommittee, who produced an array of papers for the perusal of the two groups. Their efforts were thoroughly researched and consistently creative. They are a standing monument to the strength and depth of the professionals in the family justice system here in Northern Ireland. Their presence within the process has convinced me that this jurisdiction has the potential to be at the cutting edge of family justice worldwide.
